As the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] suggests to me, Great Britain could have surrendered much more easily. All she need have done was to say: "We consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty."

That, however, is not the only thing. The third article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say—

Rules 1 to 6 are then enumerated:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

That is declared by the treaty to be substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople regarding the Suez Canal. Turn to the convention of Constantinople, and see what guide you find there to determine what was the scope and character of the equality provided in this first rule, which is said to be substantially as provided in the treaty of Constantinople.

The treaty of Constantinople was made, not before title to the canal was obtained, as in the case of our Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but after the title was obtained. The company that built the Suez Canal had already gotten their grant from the territorial sovereign when this convention was made. Our Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made before the grant was obtained from the territorial sovereign.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a matter of information, was that after Disraeli had bought a majority of the stock in the Suez Canal?

Mr. ROOT. I am not certain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was bought prior to that, was it not?

Mr. ROOT. I am not positive.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The date of the treaty was 1888?

Mr. ROOT. October 29, 1888.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was after Disraeli bought the stock.

Mr. ROOT. It must have been afterwards. This convention provides that Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, Spain, and so forth—

Wishing to establish by a conventional act a definite system destined to guarantee at all times and for all the powers the free use of the Suez Maritime Canal, and thus to complete the system under which the navigation of this canal has been placed by the firman of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, dated the 22d of February, 1866 (2 Zilkadé, 1282), and sanctioning the concessions of His Highness the Khedive, have named as their plenipotentiaries; that is to say—

The firman of the Sultan sanctioning the concession of the Khedive under date of the 22d of February, 1866, referred to in this paragraph, provides for a great variety of circumstances and conditions relating to the construction and operation of the canal, and in article 17 it provides:

The dues are to be levied without exception or favor upon all vessels under like conditions.

So that was a fundamental basis under which the Suez Canal was to be operated and to which this convention was to apply. The convention then proceeds:

The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag.

Article 12:

The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded. Moreover, the rights of Turkey as the territorial power are reserved.

There, sir, you have the Suez Canal convention declaring the principle of equality as one of the bases of its convention, a convention made to regulate the operation of the canal under a concession by the Khedive and a firman by the Sultan which prescribes that equal tolls shall be exacted of all vessels under like conditions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And after Great Britain had become the owner.

Mr. ROOT. This convention which makes that declaration of absolute and universal equality of tolls a basis of its agreement was made, as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, after Great Britain had become the chief owner and arbiter of the canal. Now, I come back to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Article 3:

The United States adopts, as the basis—

They use the very term of the twelfth article of the Suez convention, which makes equality one of the bases of its convention. They use the very words of the twelfth article.

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, etc.:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

An "entire equality" substantially as embodied in the Suez convention. You are bound to say that the equality was substantially the same. When these negotiators at that very instant were appealing to the Suez convention and declaring the treaty they were making was substantially the same in the rule of equality which it prescribed, when they were declaring that what they were doing was substantially like what the Suez convention did—you are not at liberty to say that at that very instant they meant something entirely different. If you do that, you say they were dishonest, they were disingenuous, they were deceiving Great Britain.

Ah, Mr. President, the worst thing about it is that our Government has said from generation to generation it was going to treat all the world alike in whatever it did about this canal; that the makers of our treaty declared that they were preserving unimpaired the equality established in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that the makers of our treaty declared that the provision for equality was substantially the same as that in the Suez treaty; that that was the uniform, the unvarying attitude of the United States in every step which we took to acquire title to the Canal Zone and to get the unrestricted right to own and operate the canal; and not until after we got it, not until after we were secure, did any American ever broach the idea that we were to use the canal for selfish advantage commercially; that to the political control, to the military control, to the power of ownership and regulation and management we were to add a discrimination against all the rest of the world for the purpose of enabling our merchant ships to outdo them in competition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon me for a suggestion?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We not only waited until after we acquired title but we waited until after we concluded that possibly the operation of the canal would be unprofitable before we made this claim.

Mr. ROOT. I am obliged to the Senator for his suggestion.

Now, what are the arguments for the narrower construction? It is said that in this first rule the words "observing these rules" limit the words "all nations," so that they can not be held to include the United States. You can not give that construction to those words, if there is any construction that can be given to them consistent with the declarations that I have been recounting here. Is it a necessary construction? Certainly not. In the first place, when you look at the history of the words "observing these rules" you see that they were put into the clause for an entirely different purpose. They were not put there for the purpose of excluding the United States. The reason why they were put there appears in full, and with great distinctness and beyond any doubt, in the correspondence and the record of the negotiations.

The original Hay-Pauncefote treaty contained a clause providing that other nations should be invited to adhere, to come in and become parties to the contract. Our negotiators insisted in negotiating the second treaty that that should go out. Indeed, the Senate had stricken it out in its amendment of the first treaty. When Great Britain assented to that she said that that done by itself, leaving the provision that the canal should be free and open to the vessels of all nations upon terms of entire equality, would operate against her in time of war, because the rules from 2 to 5 in the third article of the treaty, which described the conditions and requirements of neutrality of the canal, would be binding upon her, since she was a party to the treaty, and they would not be binding upon any other country; and so other countries, being entirely free from all the limitations of these neutrality provisions, would have an advantage over her and she would be subject to a burden. Accordingly she put into this first clause "all nations agreeing to observe these rules." But Mr. Choate and Mr. Hay said no; we will have no nations agreeing at all; that would let them into a contract relation with the United States regarding the canal, and that we will not have. Strike out "agreeing" and put it "all nations observing these rules," because then any country which does not wish to observe the neutrality provisions and rules 2 to 5 or 2 to 6 will be excluded from the use of the canal and Great Britain will not be placed at a disadvantage in time of war. That was the sole reason for putting in those words, and it appears, I say, in full.

Now, we are asked to give an entirely different meaning and effect to the introduction of those words, a meaning and effect which the negotiations show never entered the minds of the negotiators upon either side.

It appears very clearly, by the enumeration of the changes in the treaty when it was sent to the Senate, that the introduction of the words "observing these rules" was not understood by the makers of the treaty as producing any change whatever in the meaning of the first article except the limitation that I have referred to, for Mr. Hay, in the memorandum which came with the treaty, states the changes from the first form of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which did not contain the words "observing these rules," but was for all nations, not limited to nations observing these rules. He says they were as follows:

First. In the new draft of treaty the provision superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a whole.

Second. By a change in the first line of article 3, instead of the United States and Great Britain jointly adopting as the basis of the neutralization of the canal, the rules of neutrality prescribed for its use as was provided by the former treaty, the United States now alone adopts them.

Third. The omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from clause 1 of article 3.

Fourth. The striking out of the provision by which other powers were to be invited to come in and adhere to the treaty.

Fifth. The change from the former treaty in the omission of the provision in clause 7 of article 3, which prohibited the fortification of the canal, and the transfer to clause 2 of the remaining provision of clause 7, that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Sixth. The omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace," and dispensing with the necessity of the Davis amendment, giving express authority to the United States to protect itself in time of war.

That is the enumeration of the changes that were made, and you will find no place there for any change made by the introduction of the words "observing these rules." It appears affirmatively otherwise that the negotiators did not consider that they were making any change, for Mr. Choate says in his final account of the second treaty, which I have already read to you, for a different purpose—

It gives us an American canal, the sole condition of its being always neutral and free for the passage of the ships of all nations on equal terms.

Now, that is his statement of what this treaty meant. The clause which provided that the treaty was to be for all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality Mr. Choate translates as being on the sole condition of its being always neutral and free for the ships of all the nations on equal terms; and Mr. Hay, in his account to the Senate of the terms of this final treaty written to Mr. Cullom, says:

While omitting to invite other nations to adhere to the treaty when ratified, and so to acquire contract rights in the canal, it was thought that the provision that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality would practically meet the objection

He says, further, that Lord Pauncefote was requested "to reach a conclusion which should be satisfactory to the United States, if this could be done without departing from the great principle of neutrality, including the use of the canal by all nations on equal terms."

And he says it was believed that the declaration that it should be free and open to all nations of the world on terms of entire equality would practically meet the force of the objection which had been made.

I refer you again to the message of President Roosevelt, transmitting this treaty to the Senate, in which he describes it as a treaty which assures the right to the free passage of the canal to all the nations of the world on equal terms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from New York think that President Roosevelt intended by that language to exclude the United States from the power to exempt its own coastwise ships?

Mr. ROOT. No; I do not think he had that in mind at all. I think that he had in mind then the subject which I am now discussing. It has nothing to do with the coastwise ships. The subject which I am now discussing is the question, What was the rule of equality declared in the third article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? The question whether coastwise vessels furnished an exception to that rule is an entirely different question, which I shall come to presently.

I am certain there is no other conclusion that can be reached, and that President Roosevelt in that message intended to declare that this treaty established the broad rule of equality for all nations. He did not stumble over the words "observing these rules." He said:

Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was explicitly provided that the United States should control and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms.

That is what he understood the treaty meant.

But it is said that the broad construction can not be given, because the United States is not to observe these rules. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I turn again to the words of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Under article 3 there are six rules prescribed. The first is that—

The canal shall be free and open * * * on terms of entire equality.

We are told that that is not a rule, because it does not relate to neutrality, and that the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of article 3 are rules. Well, Mr. President, the treaty says it is a rule. I do not know that any of us should assume to know better than the treaty makers or assume to know better than the treaty itself. The treaty says:

That is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

And I ask whether the United States was not to observe this rule?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How would Great Britain observe that first paragraph?

Mr. ROOT. Perhaps she could not. The rules are to be observed by the countries as they are applicable to those countries. The code of rules may none of them ever have to be observed by any country except the United States, because there may be no country ever under such circumstances as to call one of them into application, but it is quite clear that the first paragraph under the preamble in article 3 is a rule, because the treaty says it is, and that the nation which is primarily charged with the observance of that is the United States, so that the United States must be considered as coming within the description of nations observing these rules. But let us pass to the others:

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal.

They evidently thought the United States had something to do with that rule or they would not have expressly provided for what they apparently considered an exception to it.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end, but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

Mr. President, all those rules of neutrality, the product of the direct application of the principle of neutralization preserved from the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, are primarily for the observance of the United States. We are not dealing with an unknown subject here; we are dealing with a subject which has enlisted the attention of publicists and rulers and diplomatists since international law began.

We undertook in the treaty of Washington to formulate certain rules, and we did formulate certain rules of neutrality, to the observance of which Great Britain and the United States pledged themselves, and for the nonobservance of those rules in the past, through the Geneva arbitration, we compelled Great Britain to pay us $15,000,000.

There are two kinds of neutrality—the result of neutralization by a general convention, in which a great number of countries declare certain territory to be neutral and all accept the burden of maintaining the neutrality and observing it; that is one. The other is the neutrality which a territorial sovereign declares in respect of its territory. The leader of the world in neutrality of that description is the United States. It commenced its wise and beneficent treatment of the subject by Washingon's neutrality proclamation. When any country declares the neutrality of its territory as between any two or more belligerents, that country assumes the duty of observing the rules which the law of nations has established for the regulation of neutrality. A part of those rules were codified in the treaty of Washington in 1871. In that treaty Great Britain and the United States in express terms declare that the high contracting parties agree to observe those rules, there were codified in that treaty. The most enlightened and advanced rules regulating the neutrality of a country under the powers of a single sovereignty were codified here in this Hay-Pauncefote treaty and imposed upon the United States, because the change from the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the second treaty changed the character of the neutrality from a neutrality by universal agreement, to a neutrality by the fiat of the sovereign of the territory, the controller of the territory. Those rules have been codified again in the neutrality treaty of the second Hague conference of 1907; and in that codification there are express provisions declaring in detail the obligations of the sovereign guaranteeing the neutrality. There is not a rule here, from the second to the fifth, that does not impose duties upon the United States. Where the rule says the canal shall not be blockaded, the duty of observance rests upon Great Britain as a contracting party; it rests upon all other countries that use the canal, because they avail themselves of the privilege; it rests upon the United States, because she has contracted that the canal shall be open; and it will be her duty to stop a blockade if she has the physical power, and if she has not it will be her duty to exact reparation from any party who violates the rule by blockading the canal.

If ships of war, in time of war, shall loiter in the canal, it is her duty to urge them forward. If a ship stays to the limit of 24 hours, it is her duty to give notice and to require it to leave. If a ship undertakes to disembark or to embark men and munitions in time of war, it is the duty of the United States to prevent it. We have time and again in our diplomatic history acknowledged the duty of observance both by the power that guarantees the neutrality of the territory and the duty of the powers that avail themselves of the privilege of using the neutralized territory. We have made amends for violating the territory of a neutral; we have exacted amends of others that have violated our neutral territory; and every rule which is contained in the second article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in regard to neutrality is a rule the observance of which is incumbent upon the United States.

We are told that the United States can not be supposed to have been laying down rules for herself as a customer; that this article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty prescribes rules for the customers of the canal, and that we can not suppose that the United States expected to be its own customer. Well, that involves confusion of ideas between the vessels of citizens of the United States and vessels of the United States itself, to which I have already adverted. The customers of the canal are not nations in their political capacity. If this canal had been built by a company, as was within the contemplation of the treaty and the words of the treaty, the United States politically would not have been a customer of the canal; but the ships of the citizens of the United States and the owners of those ships would have been customers, the ships of the United States would have been customers, and the ships of all other countries would have been customers. American citizens owning American registered and enrolled ships will be customers of the canal just as much as will be the subjects of other countries.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROOT. I will ask Senators not to interrupt me further. I have taken a very long time, and I am becoming weary and am very anxious to finish.

We are also told that all presumptions are against grants in derogation of sovereignty. There are two things to be said about that: In the first place, when we made this treaty we had no sovereignty. We made no grant in derogation of sovereignty; we made no grant affecting any sovereignty that we had. The observance of this provision is a reservation in favor of the sovereignty of Panama in her grant to us, and the observance of that reservation is one of the stipulations under which we acquired the right to build the canal.

Another thing to be said about that argument is that no stipulation about the amount of tolls can be in derogation of sovereignty under any circumstances. Fixing tolls is a business transaction. When the United States goes into business as the owner of a railroad or of a canal, the fixing of a charge is not an act of sovereignty; it is an act of business.

Did we derogate from sovereignty when we made our treaty in 1854, our treaty in 1871, and our still more recent treaty of 1909, in which we agreed that the tolls charged upon Canadian or British vessels in all our canals along the boundary should be measured by the tolls charged to American citizens? Have we lost our sovereignty over the Sault Canal? Do we derogate our sovereignty when we agree that we shall charge the same rates in our ports to citizens of other countries that we charge to citizens of our own country? Have we thereby lost our sovereignty over the port of New York or of Boston or of Philadelphia or of Buffalo?

The argument is made that this treaty is no longer binding because there has been a change of sovereignty. There has been much argument made upon the express provision of this treaty, the fourth article, under which it was expressly provided that no change of sovereignty should affect the rights and duties of the parties to the treaty; but the correspondence shows that that fourth article of the treaty was put in for the express purpose of preventing any such argument as has been made here from prevailing. Here is Mr. Choate writing to Mr. Hay about this fourth article. That was proposed by Great Britain. Form was given to it by Mr. Hay. Let me read it again:

> It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Mr. Choate writes:

> The idea "change of sovereignty," of course, relates to the report of an intention on the part of the United States to acquire a strip of territory on each side of the canal, and "other change of circumstances" is aimed at the argument in some future epoch against the continuance of this treaty that has often been directed against the continued binding force of the C.-B. treaty that "change of circumstance" since 1850 has put an end to it.

And Mr. Hay's letter to Senator Cullom, referring to the Lansdowne treatment of the negotiation, says:

> In this connection he referred to the fact that the new treaty contained no stipulation against the acquisition of sovereignty over the territory through which the canal should pass.
> It was claimed that if Great Britain were now to be called upon to surrender the interests and the principle thus secured by what remained of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, there should be, in view of the character of the treaty now to be concluded and of the "general principle" of neutralization thus reaffirmed in the preamble, some clause inserted agreeing that no change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass shall affect such "general principle" or release the parties, or either of them, from their obligations under this treaty.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator a question for instruction merely? Were any rights of sovereignty reserved to the United States under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty such as were reserved to Turkey under the Suez convention?

Mr. ROOT. I think I would answer that question in the negative. At the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made neither party had sovereignty, and there could be no reservation of any rights of sovereignty. The convention manifestly contemplated that the United States should, either for itself or for a company to be patronized by it, acquire certain rights for the construction of a canal on the Isthmus, either by the way of Nicaragua or of Panama. All questions of sovereignty would necessarily have to be dealt with in the instrument which conferred those rights. In the treaty with Nicaragua, to which I have already referred, the United States acquired rights very far short of sovereignty; in the Hay-Herran treaty, which was negotiated with Colombia immediately after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and which Colombia refused to ratify, the United States received rights very far short of sovereignty. But in the Panama treaty, for the first time, there was a grant to the United States of what amounted to substantial sovereignty over the Canal Zone, Panama, however, making certain reservations and imposing certain stipulations, among them a stipulation that the canal should always be free and open to ships of all nations upon the terms of the third article and all the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. COLT. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator. I simply want to suggest that, as it lay in my mind, the provision as to change of sovereignty being inserted in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty and our negotiators failing in the conclusion of that treaty to reserve to the United States the same rights of sovereignty of the territorial sovereign which were reserved to Turkey, the territorial sovereign of the Suez Canal, under, I think, the tenth and thirteenth articles of the Suez convention, whether it was not an omission on their part not to reserve to the United States the same sovereign rights reserved in the Suez convention.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, it may be that it would have been advisable to put into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty some clause of that kind, but manifestly the controlling provision must be the provision of the treaty with Panama, because only the sovereign can effectively reserve such rights.

Mr. President, when we are talking about the infringement of sovereignty, and especially when we hear heated denunciations of what is called the surrender of American sovereignty, assertions that we have built the canal on our own territory, with our own money, and can do what we please with it I can not forget that four years ago at this time I was representing our country before a great tribunal at The Hague, urging upon that court the rights of the United States to have observed in good faith by Great Britain the stipulations which she had made in the treaty of 1818 regarding the treatment of our fishermen upon the coasts and in the bays and harbors of Newfoundland. I was urging then that under the treaty of 1818, which provided that American fishermen should have in common with the subjects of His Brittanic Majesty the liberty to take fish upon that coast, Great Britain was bound to treat our fishermen in letter and in spirit by the rule of equality and of justice, although it was in her waters, in the unquestioned territory of her oldest colony, that we were claiming to exercise our rights. The result of that arbitration was that, pursuant to the provisions of the award and the agreement between the countries adjusting and giving effect to it if any law be passed now which the fishermen of the United States regard as unjust and unequal toward them in the exercise of their calling in those British waters, upon the objection of the United States it is suspended in operation and submitted to the arbitration of an impartial international tribunal to determine whether it shall take effect. Ah, Mr. President, conformity to the obligations of treaties is the highest exercise of sovereignty and not the infringement of sovereignty.

It seems to me, sir, that I have now reached a point where I am justified in leaving the main question, which I have discussed with a feeling that I have, in a poor and halting way, but by the presentation of substantial matter, established the general rule prescribed in the third article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as a rule of real entire equality, of real absence of discrimination, applicable to all the nations of the world, to all ships, to all subjects, and to all citizens.

The question to which we now must pass is the question whether the statute which is sought to be repealed is in conformity with that rule of equality.

It is said that coastwise traffic may be exempted from that rule, and that is claimed on the authority of the case of Olsen against Smith in One hundred and ninety-fifth Supreme Court Reports. In that case the court say:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore, there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply, without discrimination, to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

It will be perceived that that utterance of the Supreme Court lays down the rule of equality as to trade of the same kind. Now, sir, I do not doubt that coastwise trade, real coastwise trade, is a special kind of trade, standing by itself, quite unlike the great over-seas trade. All countries, as a rule, treat their coastwise trade with special favor; they charge reduced rates for the privileges it has in their ports; and if any such real coastwise trade, any of the trade that has been known to the laws and treaties and navigators and traders time out of mind as coastwise trade, or cabotage, were to pass through the Panama Canal, I should not question the right to treat that in a different way from the great over-seas trade that goes through that canal. But, Mr. President, the real gist of this discrimination is not the discrimination between coastwise trade, properly so called, and other trade. No real coastwise trade will go through that canal. It is a thousand miles and more away from our coast. The trade that goes through it will be real over-seas trade, carried on by great ships, making long voyages—in its mature the exact antithesis to real coastwise trade.

The trouble with this discrimination is the kind of trade which is included in this statute. The great over-seas trade, the trade from New York to San Francisco; from Portland, Me., to Seattle; from Philadelphia to Hawaii; from Baltimore to Alaska, in great ships plowing two oceans, great over-seas trade, although beginning and ending in American ports, is included by our statute under the term "coastwise" and has the benefit of this discrimination; and other countries have the same kind of trade and will send the same kind of trade through the Suez Canal. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was based upon the absence of discrimination between the same kind of trade. Here this discrimination is solely between the same kind of trade. It is a discrimination between a kind of trade carried on in American ships and the same kind of trade carried on in other ships.

Great Britain—Canada—will have the same kind of trade between Halifax and Vancouver. Mexico will have the same kind of trade between Tampico, some time Vera Cruz, and Acapulco Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Colombia; Germany between her ports and the Caroline Islands will have just the same kind of trade that we have between our Atlantic ports and Hawaii; England from London to Hongkong; Russia from her Baltic ports to her Siberian ports. There is no basis of this discrimination in the kind of trade. The basis of the discrimination is nothing but the flag; and I can not resist the conclusion, sir, that such discrimination is not in conformity with the rule of equality.

But we are told, sir, that we must not repeal this statute "at the behest of Great Britain." The behest of Great Britain!

What has Great Britain said to us? Let us see. She has said that she considered this statute to be a violation of the contract; and she said, in Mr. Mitchell Innes's note of August 27:

> I am instructed to add at the same time that should there eventually be a difference between the two countries as to the correct interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which can not be settled by other means, His Majesty's Government would then ask that it should be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the existing arbitration treaty concluded in 1908.

The same thing was said to Mr. Phillips, who was our chargé in London; and he reports that Sir Edward Grey announced in Parliament that—

> Should there eventually be a difference between the two countries respecting the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that could not be settled by other means, His Majesty's Government would ask that it be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the existing arbitration treaty concluded with the United States in 1908.

In the formal note of Sir Edward Grey to our State Department, he concludes:

> His Majesty's Government feel no doubt as to the correctness of their interpretation of the treaties of 1850 and 1901 and as to the validity of the rights they claim under them for British shipping; nor does there seem to them to be any room for doubt that the provisions of the Panama Canal act as to tolls conflict with the rights secured to their shipping by the treaty. But they recognize that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration if the Government of the United States would prefer to take this course.

Does that sound like a behest? Is there anything arrogant or insolent about that?

Let me recall to your minds, without going over the long history, what the United States has said and done in respect of arbitration. Let me recall to your minds the resolutions passed by the Senate and by the House calling for the negotiation of treaties of arbitration; the messages of Presidents, in long succession, declaring to Congress the unalterable devotion of the Government of the United States to the principle of arbitration; the multitude of treaties negotiated at the instance and by the request and urgency of the United States pursuant to these resolutions of Congress, and providing for arbitration.

Are we to regard it as arrogant and insolent that a nation with which we have made a treaty regarding the price of a service to be rendered differs from our interpretation of the treaty and proposes arbitration?

Let me recall to you also the Alabama claims, and the time when we called for arbitration to enforce our demands against Great Britain, and got it, and got judgment for $15,000,000. Let me recall when we called for arbitration of our northwestern boundary, and obtained for ourselves the disputed sovereignty to the island of San Juan, in the Strait of Fuca. Let me recall the time when we wanted arbitration for the rights of our helpless fishermen upon the Newfoundland and the Canadian coasts, and got it, and got protection for them. Let me recall the time when the miners of two countries were standing on either side of the disputed boundary line in Alaska, and in the interest of peace and civilization the two countries arbitrated the Alaska boundary, and we got the territory we claimed. Let me recall to you the Venezuela boundary controversy, when we demanded that Great Britain arbitrate. Let me read to you the language of Secretary Olney to England:

OLNEY TO BAYARD.

JULY 20, 1895.

> You are instructed, therefore, to present the foregoing views to Lord Salisbury by reading to him this communication (leaving with him a copy, should he so desire), and to reenforce them by such pertinent considerations as will doubtless occur to you. They call for a definite decision upon the point whether Great Britain will consent or will decline to submit the Venezuelan boundary question in its entirety to impartial arbitration.

Those are peremptory words, evincing no doubt of the moral right to demand arbitration.

It is the earnest hope of the President that the conclusion will be on the side of arbitration, and that Great Britain will add one more to the conspicuous precedents she has already furnished in favor of that wise and just mode of adjusting international disputes. If he is to be disappointed in that hope, however—a result not to be anticipated and, in his judgment, calculated to greatly embarrass the future relations between this country and Great Britain—it is his wish to be made acquainted with the fact at such early date as will enable him to lay the whole subject before Congress in his next annual message.

He laid it before Congress. You all remember that it was a war message. All the world understood it. He got his arbitration.

Oh, arbitration when we want it, yes; but when another country wants it, "Never, never furl the American flag at the behest of a foreign nation."

Mr. President, the subject that I am now discussing raises sharply the question how the American people want their affairs to be conducted. They have a multitude of relations with other countries. They are doing a business of over four thousand million dollars with other countries. They are traveling all over the world in hundreds of thousands. They are receiving in this country hundreds of thousands of the citizens of other countries. Vast interests of property and of liberty and of life are regulated by the great body of treaties and conventions that we have with other countries. We think ourselves, and rightly think ourselves, leaders in civilization. We are for the amelioration of manners and of conduct which tends to substitute kindly feelings and considerate treatment for the rule of hatred, of strife, and of war.

Do the American people wish their representatives to treat all the other nations that are in conventional relations with us; that are brought in contact with us by travel, by trade, by all the multitudinous intercourse of modern life, upon the theory that any question of right by them is an insult, that any according of a right to them by us is a surrender? Do they want us to conduct our foreign affairs on the principle of the thoughtless youth who flings up his hat and shouts for the flag or as just and considerate men transact their own business with each other, as neighbors in a town treat each other, as business men treat their customers and the persons from whom they buy? Do they want us to be ugly and revengeful and insolent and brutal and boasting, or do they want us to be dignified and calm and considerate and reasonable in our relations with foreign countries?

I say that the argument that we are called upon to "surrender at the behest of Great Britain" raises the question which I have just described, and which I will not stop to answer, for there can be but one answer and that finds itself in the immediate response of every Senator.

But, Mr. President, why are we here discussing repeal? Great Britain asked for arbitration. Why are we here discussing repeal?

Mr. President, Mr. Taft, who was President of the United States when this controversy arose, was in favor of arbitration. He declared for arbitration in a public speech made early in January, 1913. I have not that speech here, but I know that it was before I spoke in the Senate on the 21st of January, 1913, on this subject. Mr. Taft substantially repeated what he then said in a speech at Ottawa on January 31 of this year, in which he said:

Now, we shall doubtless have to arbitrate the matter, unless Congress reverses itself. There are some hot heads that talk in absurd tones about the right of the United States to manage her own canal and her own property as she likes, no matter what she has agreed to; but that is all froth. Those are the "explosivistas."

President Roosevelt, with all his courageous and combative nature, is in favor of arbitration. President Wilson is devoted to arbitration. Senator LODGE is in favor of arbitration. Senator SUTHERLAND is in favor of arbitration. I refer to them because they have announced it upon the floor in this debate. Why am I discussing the subject here? I am in favor of arbitration.

Will you pardon me if I go back to the first thing that I ever said on this subject? When the Panama Canal bill was up in this body on the 15th of July, 1912, I said:

It appears quite certain to me, sir, that if we enact the provision which is now before us, making the discrimination against which Great Britain protests, as the other party to this international agreement, the question raised will be one for arbitration under our existing treaty with Great Britain. It will present the simplest, most unquestionable case for the submission to an impartial tribunal of the contending claims of the two parties to the contract. We could not refuse to arbitrate the question. Great Britain could not refuse to arbitrate it. It is the kind of question which our treaty of arbitration expressly requires to be arbitrated, and it is a question which ought to be arbitrated.

Instead of arguing the question, I shall content myself with suggesting to the Senate that any legislation which may be enacted ought to be framed with a view to the fact that this is a matter about which we can not finally decide. If the judgment of the Senate shall be in favor of the policy of discrimination—and mine is not; I think it is wholly unjustifiable and unnecessary—nevertheless we should exercise our power of legislation with a view to the fact that the question of our right to legislate in such a way as to discriminate is one which may be decided against us by the international tribunal to which we are bound to submit it.

After President Taft had made his public speech in favor of arbitration, I made a speech in the Senate on the 21st of June, 1913, in favor of arbitration. It was an arbitration speech, but I already knew that the obstacles to arbitration which were arising might be insurmountable, and I put the alternative that we must arbitrate or we must withdraw from the position that we refused to arbitrate.

Now, let me answer the question why we are here. I will answer by reading part of the debate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 9. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] had just put into the RECORD the letter of President Roosevelt saying that he considered that the coastwise exemption was permissible under the treaty, but that it was a subject that ought to be arbitrated. He had wound up his letter by this:

But when we have deliberately and solemnly made a promise, then I most emphatically believe that this Nation should keep that promise just as an honorable man would do as regards a private promise of the same type. Therefore I believe it to be the bounden duty of this Nation to arbitrate the question of the canal tolls under the provisions of our arbitration treaty.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said:

Mr. President, I agree with the utterances of ex-President Roosevelt to the effect that this is a question which might be very well and ought to be submitted to arbitration; but I wish to ask the question now, Do the followers of ex-President Roosevelt upon this floor believe it?

If it had been thought that this question could be submitted to arbitration, that the Senate would submit it to arbitration, the question never would have been here in its present form. When we were discussing this matter when the Panama Canal act was passed, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the colleague of the Senator who has just had this article read, in his place upon the floor of the Senate said that this was not an arbitrable question. He differed from the ex-President. He thought it was a matter that affected the independence and the vital interests and the honor of the United States. We found, or thought we found, that a good many more than a third of the Senate entertained that idea, and they were not willing to submit the question to arbitration.

I am not one of those who say that the exemption of coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls was a violation of the treaty with Great Britain; but I am one of those who say that the position which the Senate or its Members have undoubtedly taken, that they will not submit this question to arbitration, is a violation of another treaty which we have made with about eight or nine powers; a treaty which says that all questions of the interpretation of treaties shall be submitted to arbitration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been a pretty constant attendant upon the sessions of the Senate for a long time, and I do not recall that this question ever was presented to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I did not say it was. There are more ways of finding out what Senators think than by presenting a question to the Senate. Will the Senator say that he believes two-thirds of the Senate would submit this question to arbitration, or will he, on the contrary, frankly tell me that he does not believe it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am always frank when I am dealing with the Senator from Mississippi. He knows that. I will say that I do not think two-thirds of the Senate would.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I know they would not.

There we are. That is why we are here—all of us who are in favor of arbitration, we who from the beginning declared that this question ought to be determined by an impartial court of arbitration, we who have argued for it. We are here now supporting this repeal bill because, in the judgment of the old and wise and experienced Senators best qualified to judge, it was impossible and is impossible to get a vote of two-thirds of the Senate to send the question to arbitration.

There were other evidences, but I will not detain you to give them. I could read from the records of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals matter to sustain the same conclusion. A majority of 32 of the Members of the Senate would be necessary to send this case to arbitration. We are for this repeal first and chiefly because we can not arbitrate it, and to refuse to arbitrate it would be discredit and dishonor for our country.

Right or wrong, whatever rules or whatever exceptions may justify it, if we decide this in our favor and refuse to arbitrate we are discredited, we are dishonored, we have repudiated our principles.

Now, let any man who votes against this repeal take to himself the responsibility of leading his country into that position. I for one shall not. If every constituent I have were looking with hope for lower freight rates, I would not. If my convictions were so blinded that I saw only the lurid light of red flame when a railroad is mentioned, I would not lead my country into such a position. If I had away back in my childhood learned a tradition of hatred against any other country, I would not lead my own country into such a position as that. I will vote for this repeal because it is the surest and, I believe, the only way to save our country from that most discreditable result.

Mr. President, there is one argument which I have omitted to notice against this repeal. It is the argument that Great Britain alone has protested; that no other country has protested or remonstrated. That is true, so far as I know; but let me call your attention to something that happened in the course of the negotiations. You remember that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided for all other countries coming in and agreeing to share in protection. You remember that the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided that all other countries should be asked to adhere; that is to say, to become parties to the treaty. The Senate struck it out, and in the negotiation of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was omitted. You remember that Lord Lansdowne wished to have inserted in the treaty a provision limiting the benefits of freedom and equality of the canal to those nations which should agree to observe these rules, and Mr. Hay objected to having the agreement. Here is what Mr. Choate said about it. He is giving an account of an interview with Lord Lansdowne. He says:

> Secondly, I told him that I thought his amendment of the first clause of the third article, insisting upon bringing in other nations as parties to the agreement after the Senate had struck out of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the article inviting them to come in, would seem counter to the very strong conviction in the Senate, sustained, as I believe, by an equally strong and general popular conviction, that we ought not to accord to other nations any contract rights whatever in the canal which we were to build and own; that none of them, though invited, ever came in or offered to come in under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that at present they had no rights; that they must be content to rely on our national honor to keep the canal open to them, as declared in this treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. Hay reports to the Senate:

> This was represented to His Majesty's Government, and it was also insisted on the part of the United States that there was a strong national feeling among the peoples of the United States against giving to foreign powers a contract right to intervene.
> That they must rely upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth, and that it was not quite correct to speak of the nations other than the United States as being bound by the rules of neutralization set forth in the treaty.

No contract rights are given to these other powers. Our Senate will not permit it; our people will not permit it. France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Russia, and all the rest are to have no contract right, but they are to rely on the honor of the United States. They are to have only the good faith of the United States that we will observe the declarations of the treaty. They have made no representation or protest. Oh, no; they can not. They have no contract rights. They have nothing but our honor; nothing but the good faith of America.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which can be carried out by no one except ourselves.

Mr. ROOT. Yes. Mr. President, who is the guardian of a nation's honor but her own sons? Do we commit its keeping to England? Oh, no; not to England nor to any other power on earth do we commit the duty of remonstrance against our breach of honor. Our conscience must be our monitor. America must make the demand upon America that her honor and her good faith be kept without stain.

It is no petty question with England about tolls. This is a question whether the United States, put on its honor with the world, is going to make good the public declarations that reach back beyond our lives, whether the honor and good faith of the United States is as good as its bond, whether acute and subtle reasoning is to be applied to the terms of a treaty with England to destroy the just expectations of the world upon more than half a century of American professions, upon which we give no contract right, and there is no security but honor and good faith.

Sir, in the weak and inadequate arguments and appeals that I have made upon this subject I speak not for England. I do not present England's case. I do not care about her case. But I knew something about this treaty. I knew what John Hay thought. I sat next him in the Cabinet of President McKinley while it was negotiated, and of President Roosevelt when it was signed. I was called in with Senator Spooner to help in the framing of the Panama treaty which makes obedience to this Hay-Pauncefote treaty a part of the stipulations under which we get our title. I negotiated the treaty with Colombia for the settlement and the removal of the cloud upon the title to the Isthmus of Panama and carried on the negotiations with England under which she gave her assent to the privileges that were given to Colombia in that treaty. I have had to have a full conception of what this treaty meant for now nearly 13 years. I know what Mr. Hay felt and what he thought, and, Mr. President, I speak for all the forebears that went before me in America and for all that shall come after me, for the honor and credit of our country, and for that alone. If we do not guard it, who shall?

A settlement? We are told that the speech I made in January, 1913, prevented a settlement. If I could believe that, I would tell it to my children, that they might rejoice after I am gone at that one service rendered to their country. Settle? Compromise? Compromise the honorable obligations of our country? Never. If Great Britain should be so false to the duty she assumed in imposing upon us stipulations as a condition of our having the right to build the canal, if she should be so false to the duty toward mankind which she assumed then, as to commute the obligations that we took upon us for any advantage to herself, I would not consent to give one copper farthing to have her withdraw her demand.

We are right or we are wrong. If the rule of equality which we have prescribed for all the world is infringed by this statute, no negotiations with Great Britain can relieve us of our obligations to arbitrate or withdraw the statute, our obligations to the rest of the world to arbitrate or withdraw the statute, our obligations to ourselves, to our own consciences, our own sense of right and honor.

There is even more than the higher interests of an ordinary nation involved in this question.

It is now some 80 years since De Tocqueville, in his great book Democracy in America, which presented to the world so just and favoring an estimate of our country, wrote these words:

> It is therefore very difficult to ascertain at present what degree of sagacity the American democracy will display in the conduct of the foreign policy of the country, and upon this point its adversaries, as well as its advocates, must suspend their judgment. As for myself, I have no hesitation in avowing my conviction that it is most especially in the conduct of foreign relations that democratic governments appear to me to be decidedly inferior to governments carried on upon different principles.

Mr. President, I have not believed that to be true. I do not believe it to be true. I could not believe it and not despair of the future of our civilization, for more and more the control of all foreign as well as domestic affairs is coming into the hands of democracy. More and more the judgment of the great body of the people determines the actions of Secretaries of State and ministers of foreign affairs and foreign ambassadors and ministers. If democracy is incompetent to deal with foreign affairs more and more, the world will return to the chaos of international strife and war.

Our country has taught the world the most valuable lesson of modern history, if not of all history, that a democracy is competent to maintain within its own territory peace and order with justice. Our democracy has set at naught all the dismal forebodings of its enemies and compelled an unwilling assent from the Governments of the world to its entire competency to rule itself. I have believed and I do believe that the power of a developing democracy is competent to the maintenance of international peace and justice, to substitute kindly consideration, the mutual courtesy and forgiveness of international brotherhood for the hatred and strife of monarchical and dynastic rule.

Our democracy has assumed a great duty and asserts a mighty power. I have hoped that all diplomacy would be made better, purer, nobler, placed on a higher plane because America was a democracy. I believe it has been; I believe that during all our history the right-thinking, the peace-loving, the justice-loving people of America have sweetened and ennobled and elevated the intercourse of nations with each other; and I believe that now is a great opportunity for another step forward in that beneficent and noble purpose for civilization that goes far beyond and rises far above the mere question of tolls or a mere question with England. It is the conduct of our Nation in conformity with the highest principles of ethics and the highest dictates of that religion which aims to make the men of all the races of the earth brothers in the end.

Mr. President, the noble American who negotiated this treaty as Secretary of State did his share in his time toward accomplishing the beneficent work of ennobling diplomacy and the relations of states. He did it with purest patriotism and the most unswerving devotion to the interests of his own country; and I can not but feel that in preventing our country from repudiating the obligation into which he entered to make possible the great work of the canal we are rendering a service to his memory that must be grateful to his friends. I recall something that he said that is worth remembering when we are dealing with his work and thinking of the spirit in which he wrought. I ask you to listen to it:

There are many crosses and trials in the life of one who is endeavoring to serve the Commonwealth, but there are also two permanent sources of comfort. One is the support and sympathy of honest and reasonable people. The other is the conviction dwelling forever, like a well of living water, in the hearts of all of us who have faith in the country, that all we do, in the fear of God and the love of the land, will somehow be overruled to the public good; and that even our errors and failures can not greatly check the irresistible onward march of this mighty Republic, the consummate evolution of countless ages, called by divine voices to a destiny grander and brighter than we can conceive, and moving always, consciously or unconsciously, along lines of beneficent achievement whose constant aims and ultimate ends are peace and righteousness.

I invoke for the consideration of this obligation of honor and good faith, which he assumed in our behalf and in the name of our country, that nobility and largeness of spirit which he exhibited and illustrated in his life. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules of the Senate prohibit applause or demonstrations of any kind by the occupants of the galleries.

Mr. THORNTON. If no other Senator desires to address the Senate at this time on the subject of the unfinished business, I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the Agricultural appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment reported by the committee, on page 70, line 14, to strike out "$50,000" and to insert "$100,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] makes the point of order that the pending amendment was not introduced and after one day referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has stated that he introduced the amendment and had it referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the manner required by the rules. Under these circumstances the Chair——

Mr. MCCUMBER. Before the Chair rules upon that I wish to say that yesterday I tried to ascertain what that amendment was, and whether there was any record of it. When an amendment is offered and referred the amendment is printed, showing it to have been referred. Of course, if the amendment was printed and referred, my point is without force, and I withdraw it. The Senator from Louisiana has just handed me what I assume to be the amendment to which I refer.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will state, Mr. President, that what I have handed the Senator was the original amendment introduced by me in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry some time ago. As I stated yesterday, and as I think the Chair correctly ruled, the amendment yesterday offered by the chairman of the committee at the instance of the committee was substantially the same as the original amendment embodied in the bill.

Mr. MCCUMBER. May I call the attention of the Chair to what this amendment is, unless he has examined it himself, and then the Chair, of course, will have to pass upon the question whether or not it is the amendment that is now proposed? The amendment is quite lengthy, and reads:

On page 65, line 3, strike out the words beginning at "$50,000," in line 3, to and inclusive of the word "purposes," in line 5, and insert the following: "including the erection of such temporary farm buildings as may be found necessary, and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $100,000, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell in the open market or to exchange for other live stock or farm products to the best advantage, without the usual condemnation proceedings and public auction, such live stock or farm products as cease to be needed: Provided, That all moneys received from the sale of such live stock or farm products, or as a bonus in the exchange of the same, shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided further, That in any State in which this work is undertaken sufficient suitable land for the necessary experiments shall be made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the required period of time without cost to the Department of Agriculture, and that the State live-stock sanitary laws shall be enforced by the State in such manner as to justify the Secretary of Agriculture in the expenditure of money for the purpose of encouraging live-stock production."

That is the amendment which the Senator from Louisiana says was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The record would be made complete if the Secretary would now read the amendment which comes from the Committee on Agriculture, to see whether or not they are substantially the same; and I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that the ruling of the Chair is that the greater includes the less, and that the amendment which the Senator from North Dakota has just read includes, as the essential part, the appropriation of $100,000. The present occupant of the Chair has ruled that the previous amendment was obnoxious to a point of order; but the committee having removed the objectionable part, the Chair now holds that the amendment is in order, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. MCCUMBER. This is an amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, and the amendment taken as a whole——

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I should like to correct the Senator. It was offered by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It was the amendment introduced, as I understand, by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. Originally; yes.

Mr. MCCUMBER. If there is any particular distinction between the two, of course I will withdraw the statement. The amendment relates to the cotton belt and to the boll weevil.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Chair to state the parliamentary status. I did not quite understand the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been ruled in order, and the Senator from North Dakota is now speaking to the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Was the ruling of the Chair on the amendment reported by the committee on the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota? I did not quite understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has offered no substitute. The Chair ruled that the amendment reported by the committee was in order.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I was discussing the amendment, and I paused a moment until the Senator from Louisiana should return to his seat, because I think the information I desire can be given by him. I have before me an article written by J. W. Vogler. It is entitled "The death knell to the boll weevil," and the residence of Mr. Vogler is given as Alexandria, La. I know nothing about this gentleman. He assumes in his writing, however, to know practically everything about the boll weevil and the method of its extinction. One can not always judge of an individual simply by reading what he has written nor determine the accuracy of his statements, and especially is it difficult for one who is wholly unacquainted either with the cotton production or with the boll weevil to pass an opinion upon an article dealing with those matters; but he has given a great number of tables; he has criticized severely—and I am not going to repeat his criticisms, of course—the methods adopted by the Agricultural Department in the attempt to check the ravages of the boll weevil; he takes issue with the recommendation of the department as to early planting as a method of extinction and practically declares, if I understand his article aright, that if the cotton is planted as late as May 15 it will mature beyond the time when the boll weevil does its work, and therefore that no great damage, if any damage at all, will accrue by following such a system of planting. He is very earnest in his position; he elucidates his argument by a number of photographs which he has taken; and he also gives tables showing that he has examined carefully into the propagation of the weevil and setting forth the increase in cotton that is planted as late as May 15 and the increase where it is planted in the earlier stages, beginning with March 1. As the writer is from his own State, I want to ask the Senator from Louisiana if his attention has been called to that article and whether he considers that there is nothing whatever in the very strong arguments, illustrations, and statements of Mr. Vogler?

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator to repeat the name? I did not catch the name.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. J. W. Vogler, of Alexandria, La.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I have had some communications myself from that gentleman. I know nothing about the correctness of his theory. I have no confidence whatsoever in its correctness.

I have had a little personal experience in this line. My plantation was badly overflowed in 1912. The waters receded quite late, and I planted cotton. The weevil came on in time practically to destroy that crop. I think I must have complied practically with Mr. Vogler's methods that year. I know I planted very late, and I know that my neighbors planted late, and I know that the weevil came and ate up the cotton.

I know that the common impression of the people of the cotton belt who have been fighting the weevil for a number of years is that the only way they can do it successfully is to follow the methods advocated by the United States Department of Agriculture, and so persistently and ably advocated by the Bureau of Farmers' Cooperative Demonstration Work, of which Dr. S. A. Knapp for a number of years was the head.

Those methods, in brief, are to prepare the land very thoroughly, plowing it in the fall, if possible, or, if not, in the early winter, pulverizing it just as much as possible, making it like a garden plat, planting very, very early and forcing the growth of the cotton as fast as possible, using early maturing varieties of seed, so that the cotton will mature rapidly, and in a general way making the cotton before the weevils have accumulated in sufficient number to destroy it.

Those are the methods, in brief—I could go more into detail if it were necessary—which have been rather successfully carried out. Along with them goes general diversification. The farmers have been trying to raise on the farm everything needed for home consumption. They used to raise cotton, and with the proceeds of the cotton buy everything else.

Mr. Vogler's ideas may be correct, but I think he is one of these theorists who have never proved their theories.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know whether he has proved his theory or not. It is said that the lens of the camera will not lie, and he has given here a number of photographs of different fields of cotton in the same vicinity that have been planted at different periods. Some show an entire destruction by the boll weevil or some other cause, and some show a very prolific growth and development. Of course I do not know whether that is a fair test or not, but I thought, at least, that it was worthy of consideration.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to add that my colleague [Mr. THORNTON] lives in Alexandria, and he tells me that he does not think Mr. Vogler ever planted a stalk of cotton in his life. He has been there 10 or 12 years, and, I believe, he is engaged in the oil business. He is not a cotton man.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I should like to add, further, that all of us there have been conversant with Mr. Vogler, as I have known him for several years; and the State department of agriculture and the Government demonstration tests have proven absolutely that his opinions are purely theoretical, not practical, and that they are of no benefit at all to the cotton raiser. That is what both of those departments declare.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to call attention, for instance, to a little heading:

"THE SOLUTION OF THE BOLL-WEEVIL PROBLEM IS MORE AN ARITHMETICAL THAN AN AGRICULTURAL PROPOSITION."

That statement was based on the scientific researches into the life habits of the weevil as published by all entomologists of the United States. In accordance with their researches, I have prepared a table, which shows the proportionate damage to cotton from the weevil to be approximately as follows:

With May 15 planting	1
With May 1 planting	300
With April 15 planting	5,300
With April 1 planting	15,500
With March 15 planting	388,500
With March 1 planting	992,200

In addition to that, and so as to save time, because I think it is as well to refer to these figures, he gives another table showing the time of planting, the weevils that will be kept alive, the propagation of the weevils, and the produce and damage during certain periods. It is found upon page 21 of this pamphlet, and without reading I will ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. There is no objection upon my part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

In the course of years the life habits, emergence, and longevity of the boll weevil became so well known that most any man who took enough interest in this matter could establish the fact that the planting of cotton at certain dates in the spring will feed and keep alive an almost certain number of weevils and also destroy an almost certain number of squares up to a certain date in the fall, the total number being correct in their proportion to each other and the various planting dates and varying only in accordance with the original number that survived hibernation and with subsequent weather conditions. Based on these natural laws, ascertained and published by our experts for years, I have prepared another table, which probably contrasts the comparative results from early and late planting better than those I have published before. It again shows:

Time of planting.	Keeps alive weevils.	Propagates weevils to Sept. 15.	Produces damage to cotton.
March 1	1,334	43,506,558,144	$13,632,057.01
March 15	1,042	17,025,381,707	5,384,621.21
April 1	659	679,518,404	212,961.10
April 15	263	231,984,638	72,690.20
May 1	44	12,855,277	4,041.74

Mr. McCUMBER. I also ask to insert, without reading, the portion which I have marked upon page 22, which is a table, with a little explanation of the table.

The matter referred to is as follows:

For the purpose of facilitating a proper comparison, and in order that everybody, even the experts, can see at a glance the comparative results from early and late planting, expressed in the number of weevils kept alive and propagated to September 15, and the damage to cotton expressed in the most simple proportion and in dollar and cents, I offer below my latest table:

Time of planting.	Weevils kept alive.	Weevils propagated to Sept. 15.	Damage to cotton.
			Value.	Proportion.
March 1	1,334	43,506,558,144	13,632,057.01	992,866

Showing conclusively that May 15 planting will produce a damage to cotton of one, while March 1 planting is bound to produce a damage of approximately one million.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now I will read his conclusion. It reads in this way. This is a letter to the department:

If there ever was an endless chain, your department furnishes the proof for one of them:

More money, more experts.
More experts, more weevils.
More weevils, more money, etc., and thus it has been in the past and thus it will probably be also in the future, unless the unexpected happens, that either your department will advocate "uniformly and universally late planting from May 1 to 15," or that Congress will stop to appropriate money to help your department in its efforts to raise boll weevils.

It seems to me that that endless chain has been adopted in this bill in dealing with the boll-weevil situation, and especially in the rapid increase of the money that is appropriated for that purpose.

There is also a very short table on page 42, under the heading "The farmer and his boll weevils," which I ask may also be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE FARMER AND HIS BOLL WEEVILS.

In my last pamphlet, "The Solution of the Boll-Weevil Problem," I made the statement that in accordance with the most exhaustive experiment on boll-weevil hibernation, emergence, and longevity on record the proportion of weevils surviving hibernation with cotton planted on May 15, puts on squares, is 4; with cotton planted on May 1, puts on squares, is 44; with cotton planted on April 15, puts on squares, is 263; with cotton planted on April 1, puts on squares, is 659; with cotton planted on March 15, puts on squares, is 1,042; with cotton planted on March 1, puts on squares, is 1,334.

These figures represent the proportionate number of weevils that under ordinary circumstances survive hibernation on the cotton planted at the different dates named.

Mr. McCUMBER. Finally, I find this heading:

An appeal to every loyal citizen of Louisiana who would like to see "king cotton" put back on his royal throne, from which he was so unceremoniously, so insidiously, and so maliciously ousted by the boll weevil, with the assistance of the Department of Agriculture of the United States.

I judge from that heading that the conclusion of the writer has been that, notwithstanding all of the efforts of the United States Government, there has been no check whatever in the ravages of the boll weevil, but that the weevil is yearly increasing under the systems which have been adopted and will give us for all time to come an opportunity to add greater appropriations to what is known in this bill as the cotton belt.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, the conclusion is utterly unwarranted, because, as a matter of fact, the production of cotton in the State of Louisiana, which fell from 750,000 bales to 250,000 bales, has increased within the last year to about 400,000 bales through the following by the cotton farmers of Louisiana of the methods devised by the Department of Agriculture and the Government demonstration work. Those figures speak a great deal louder than words.

As far as Mr. Vogler is concerned, he is a personal friend of mine, and has been for years, and is thoroughly conscientious; but I have no hesitation in saying that his theories are not accepted among the practical, progressive farmers of Louisiana. They have been tested, and the farmers declare that they are an utter failure. There is not one in one thousand of the cotton planters in Louisiana who has any belief in the theories advanced by Mr. Vogler on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for a division, then.

There were, on a division—ayes 16, noes 8.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	du Pont	McCumber	Sheppard
Bankhead	Fall	Martin, Va.	Sherman
Brady	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Brandegee	Gore	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Bryan	Hitchcock	Overman	Swanson
Burleigh	Hughes	Page	Thompson
Burton	Johnson	Pittman	Thornton
Catron	Jones	Pomerene	Tillman
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Ransdell	Townsend
Chilton	Kern	Reed	Vardaman
Crawford	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Warren
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	West

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence from the Chamber of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained on account of sickness.

Mr. KERN. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to call brief attention to the result of the call that has just been made.

This morning the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] admonished us that we must be prepared for long sessions, and very likely night sessions, in the near future. I am one of those who are very anxious to get the business of the session completed as speedily as possible, hoping, however, that the program may be made by the legislative branch and not by some other branch of the Government.

The roll has been called. On the first roll call there were 24 of the majority present, and 5 other Senators on the Democratic side subsequently answered, making 29. That was the number of Democratic Senators present on the roll call.

I would merely suggest to my good friend the Senator from Indiana that if the present session is to be completed at some reasonable time, I think I ought to be granted the privilege of saying that I think the Senator ought to see that the majority Senators are more regular in attendance than they seem to be. The Republican side, in the minority, furnished almost as many votes on the roll call as the Democratic side.

I am not in the habit of scolding, and I am not going to do it. I could not do anything about it if I tried; but I am one of those, as I said a moment ago, who are really very anxious to complete the work of the present session at the earliest practicable and proper moment.

Mr. KERN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the roll call he refers to occurred very late in the day. Notwithstanding that fact I regret as much as he does the lack of interest and attention on the part of Members upon this side. I hope that that trouble will be remedied, and I have no doubt it will be remedied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. There was not a quorum present, as was evident when the request was made for yeas and nays. Therefore, I renew the request for yeas and nays upon this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, having been detained a considerable part of the time during the last two days in attendance upon a conference committee, I ask that the amendment may be stated. It can be done in a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 14, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000."

Mr. SHIVELY. Do I understand that that is a committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. SHIVELY. The House fixed the amount at $50,000, and the committee has increased it to $100,000?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the amendment. The clause will be read as it would stand if amended.

The SECRETARY. The paragraph would read if amended:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned, or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States, $100,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the purchase of animals for breeding purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is absent from the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], but I am privileged to vote on any matters connected with this bill, and I vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. WALSH. I am paired with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent, and that he is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], who has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and also the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], who has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]; that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]; that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]; that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—35.

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill by striking out line 25 on page 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out line 25, on page 30, in the following words:

Chugach National Forest, Alaska, $16,330.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

[Mr. PITTMAN addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we have been here almost seven hours to-day in this superheated atmosphere. I will ask the Senator from Indiana, inasmuch as this matter can not be completed to-night, if he will not move to adjourn.

Mr. KERN. I will make a motion at this time, with the permission of the Senator from Nevada, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he make his motion that the hour of meeting shall be 11 o'clock until further ordered, and let it be so understood. I missed an hour the other day, supposing that we were to meet at 12 o'clock, and I think it would be better to fix the hour at 11 o'clock.

Mr. KERN. It requires a resolution, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I think not.

Mr. KERN. I move, then, that until otherwise ordered by the Senate the daily hour of meeting shall be fixed at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now will the Senator move to adjourn?

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator from Nevada yield for the purpose of enabling me to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 22, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 21, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who openest Thine hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing, without whom nothing is strong, nothing enduring. "The Lord is righteous in all His ways, and holy in all his works. The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon Him, to all that call upon him in truth." Open Thou our minds and hearts that we may be susceptible to the heavenly influence, that our work may be well pleasing in Thy sight and a perpetual memorial to our trust and confidence in Thee. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16508, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and pending the motion he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by himself and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman want? Nobody wants to talk on this side.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason. I was afraid that they would use the hour. I do not know whether anybody wants to talk or not. There is nobody here in the House, and I am going to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MURDOCK. No one here wants any time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. We can tell better when somebody is here. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the vote upon the motion of the gentleman from New York to go into the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, what became of the point of no quorum?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is an automatic call on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I made the point of order before there was any roll call.

The SPEAKER. That is true. The gentleman made the point of order that there was no quorum present. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker just stated the question as to going into the Committee of the Whole. I think the motion would be to have a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was explaining to the Members that when the roll was called those who desired to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union would vote "aye" and those opposed would vote "nay."

Mr. MANN. Yes; but, Mr. Speaker, there has been no vote taken upon that question.

The SPEAKER. That is true. It takes a call of the House. There is no automatic call on this motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The question had not been taken, and I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this vote 271 Members have answered to their names, a quorum, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] if we can not make some agreement as to general debate?

Mr. GILLETT. I think I can get along with 50 minutes on this side.

FURTHER URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the general debate on the deficiency bill be limited to 1 hour and 40 minuted, 50 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and 50 minutes by myself.

Mr. GILLETT. I will consent to that.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the gentleman from New York asks that general debate be limited to 1 hour and 40 minutes, one half of that time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16508, the further urgent deficiency bill, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16508) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $6,770,632.24. This amount is to supply money for matters of immediate necessity in connection with the several departments of the Government. Of this sum $6,368,932.24 is for the War Department; $29,500 is to make some additional alterations in the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing for occupancy by some of the offices of the Treasury Department by the 1st of July; $100,000 is to supply deficiencies in the epidemic fund of the Public Health Service; $25,000 is to equip an old naval vessel for use as a quarantine station at Providence, R. I.; $35,000 is for the Department of Commerce—it has been customary to make certain appropriations for the Alaska service immediately available in the sundry civil bill. Part of that appropriation has been transferred to this bill so that the money will be available by the 1st of June; $4,200 is carried to provide the special paper on which the certificates of naturalization are printed; $52,000 is to meet the requirements of the contingent fund of the House; and $6,000 is for the folding of speeches for Members.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman about the item for the Interstate Commerce Commission for continuing the work of the valuation of property.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And $100,000 for the work of valuation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission, as the gentleman will recall, last year asked for a million and a half dollars and there was appropriated $400,000 with the understanding that if additional money was required it would be furnished in the urgent deficiency bill. It was estimated that the $400,000 would carry the commission up to the 1st of February; that was their estimate, but the committee believed it would carry them further. Now, it appears that $100,000 is needed to carry the commission through the month of June. That is all they ask at this time.

Mr. MURDOCK. That makes a total expenditure of $500,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. About a half a million dollars. In addition, in their estimates for the next fiscal year they ask for $2,000,000, and ask that $100,000 be made immediately available, so as to take care of the month of June. The sundry civil bill will not become a law before the end of June, and so as to avoid a stoppage of the work of valuation $100,000 is carried in this bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain what stage this work has reached? What has the commission done? The organization is now complete, of course?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has perfected its organization and has several field parties out, but because of the delay and difficulty in obtaining men through the Civil Service Commission it was not able to organize as rapidly as the commission had anticipated.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, the actual work of valuation has then begun?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Hardly the actual work of valuation, but some of the field forces have been started to obtain the data upon which the valuation will be made. Mr. Chairman, unless some one wishes to inquire about some particular item in the bill, I shall reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the contingent expense item of the House of $52,000, what is the occasion for that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chief Clerk of the House pointed out that certain expenditures resulting from investigations by special committees which continued practically the entire year because of the prolonged session of Congress had made very great inroads upon the contingent fund. There is about $30,000 due for telegrams; about $3,500 a month paid as compensation to various employees, who are charged to the contingent fund of the House; some money was expended out of the fund for the folding of speeches; and special stenographers to various committees costing between $1,000 and $2,000. The Committee on the Judiciary has been holding very extensive hearings. The Committee on Mines and Mining has been investigating the two strikes, one in Michigan and one in Colorado, and the Committee on the District of Columbia in its investigations has spent about $750 a month.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain what was the bill of the committee, for instance, that went to Michigan? How large a bill is that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bills of the two committees have not been segregated—that is, the two subcommittees—but they have spent, I think, about $10,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, in the case of the Committee on the Judiciary, this item, I take it, relates to special and select committees; but, of course, the Committee on the Judiciary is a standing committee. Does it draw out of the contingent fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where hearings are being held by various committees and the committee stenographers are working, so that they can not attend to all the committees, they then call in additional stenographers, and they are paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, printing does not come out of this item at all?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For instance, the Committee on the Judiciary investigated a Federal judge in the South, and in matters of that character the expense is charged against these funds.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Committee on the Judiciary, of course, has been very busy, and has had a great amount of printing done. That comes out of another item?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no deficiency asked for that at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman state how much was required for telegrams sent by Members of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are about $30,000 due now, I think.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that the average expenditure for telegrams of Members?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the annual expenditure is about as high as that—$40,000 or $50,000 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this is only for a portion of it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is for some accumulated bills that have not been paid. Of course the fact that the Congress has been almost continuously in session, and Members sent many more telegrams on that account, increases very greatly that expense.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is almost an average of $100 a year for each Member.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have never averaged it that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. It seems to me it is a very large amount per Member for telegraphic service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would be a very large amount for myself. It is not, perhaps, a large amount for other Members. It depends largely upon the part of the country that a Member is from.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would say that for the majority of this House the average is not over $5 or $10 a year, and if the average, according to the expenditure, is $100 a Member, there must be some Members who are using the telegraphic service very freely.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think it was two or three years ago that the Committee on Appropriations, when the deficiency resulting on this account was called to its attention, went into the matter quite exhaustively and recommended that thereafter no telegrams be paid for by the House, and that if Members wished to send messages upon public business by telegraph they should pay for them. But the overwhelming sentiment of the House, as indicated by the vote on that provision, was such that the committee has acquiesced in the sentiment as then expressed that the House desired to have this service, and has not attempted to trespass upon the time of the House by further recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is pending before the House a bill seeking to restrict the extravagant expenditure of money for printing. Does not the gentleman think there should be some limit, just as in the case of stationery allowance, to the Members for telegraphic services? There must be some Members who are using the telegraphic service to the extent of hundreds of dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was incorporated in the recommendation to which I referred a moment ago, and in view of the attitude of the House I do not think my opinion was considered very valuable on the question. I think there have been some abuses in connection with it—how much, I do not know. The Committee on Accounts is charged with the duty of checking up these accounts and of passing upon the question of whether telegraphic messages sent by Members, indorsed "official business," so as to be paid for by the House, come within that category. I am not sufficiently familiar with the character of the messages from any investigation that I have made to be able to express any opinion upon the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who passes upon the auditing of these accounts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are audited by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. WOODRUFF. As a member of the Committee on Accounts, I will say that some Members of this House, men who have run up these large accounts for telegraphing, have, to my mind, charged telegrams to the Government account that should not have been charged to that account. I think they should have been paid for out of the Member's personal funds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will disallow the account and compel the Member to pay for such telegrams it would stop that practice.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. How does the gentleman determine that?

Mr. WOODRUFF. By examination of the telegrams.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has he made those examinations?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have. I will say this, further, that I think it is the disposition of some members of the Committee on Accounts to recommend to this House that a certain definite sum be allowed each Member—something like $40. I think that is the average expended by all the Members of the House. Some Members spend less than $5 during the quarter; some other Members spend more than $200; and the average being about $40, the Accounts Committee, I believe, is prepared to recommend to the House that no Member of this House be allowed more than $40 a year for telegraphic expenses.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman say that some Members spend more than $100 per quarter out of the public funds?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think there is one Member of this House that has spent about $400 per year.

Mr. WILLIS. In a year?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. That is an amazing bit of information.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman if it is in that connection.

Mr. HOWARD. Upon the question of recommending a stipulated amount of $40 a year, for instance, you are willing to admit that some Members of this House have occasion to spend more than $40 upon absolutely legitimate business connected with their duties, on account of the commercial interests in their districts?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. While others have strictly agricultural districts and would have no necessity to spend hardly any sum?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Do you not think it has come to a pretty pass in the American House of Representatives when a Member of Congress, elected by his constituents and sworn in here to serve as a Representative, can not be trusted to send a message by wire in connection with official business?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not; and I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] if he would take the time to examine some of the messages that have been sent at Government expense, he would agree with me.

Now, I will say further that if the Committee on Accounts make these recommendations and they are adopted by the House, it does not necessarily imply that every man will be supposed to use his $40 allowance. This is a fact, that many telegrams are sent by Members of this House when telegrams are not necessary under the circumstances. I think the membership of the House is given to resorting to the use of the telegraph when the Postal Service would answer just as well.

Mr. HOWARD. I will just state to the gentleman that if he brings in a recommendation here limiting the amount to $40, or any other sum, that I for one will fight against it, as it will do an injustice to some of the western Members of the House, who have necessarily to do some of their business by wire.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that many Members of the House would vote against such a recommendation as that.

Mr. HOWARD. People are straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel about this little old telegram business. It does not amount to a row of pins.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman would not say that if he had examined some of the telegrams that have been sent out at Government expense and some of the bills that have been turned in to the House.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, what is the practice of the committee——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is it to find out whether or not the matter treated in the telegrams is public business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care, Mr. Chairman, to have that discussed further at this time, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman yield a little further on this telegram business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, to make a little statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. We can not get it out of the time we have on this side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All right.

Mr. MANN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is not permissible in this body to make any reference to the Senate, and I shall not do so. But in another distinguished body than this [laughter] there was recently proposed that Members of that body should not be permitted to send telegrams at an expense other than their own in excess of $60 a year, as I recall it. There was considerable discussion of the subject, and the matter finally came to the point of a vote, and one of the distinguished Members of that body offered a substitute resolution that no telegrams should be sent at the expense of anybody other than the persons who sent them. A roll call was had upon that, and nearly every Member of the body voted for the substitute resolution. But in parliamentary bodies, after you have amended a resolution by inserting a substitute, the question recurs on the resolution as amended; and the distinguished Members of the other body having gone on record some months ago in favor of no telegrams being sent except at their own expense, it has not been possible yet to get a vote upon the resolution as amended [laughter], although it has been strenuously insisted upon. But every time the proposition has come up there has been either a lack of a quorum or other very important business that must be immediately attended to; and I would not be surprised if the same thing would occur in this body if we got up to that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. GILLETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, some of the appropriations of this bill are made necessary by war or preparation for imminent war. For 12 months we were assured by the President and Secretary of State that the purpose of their policy was to maintain peace with Mexico, and at intervals soothing assurances of success were given out. Some of us months ago criticized that policy on the ground that though it ostensibly aimed at peace, it fundamentally and inevitably tended to war. Now we have the result. You may call it reprisal or intervention, or what you please, but when the armed forces of one nation invade the soil of another nation, attack, and drive away its army and hold its forts, ordinary people not versed in the artificial distinctions in which diplomacy revels call it war.

I regret extremely that our predictions were fulfilled. The President made intervention and war probable if not inevitable when he took the untenable position that he had a right to say to Mexico that there was one Mexican citizen, and that her most prominent one, whom she could never have as ruler, however much she might desire it, and threw all the weight of this Government on the side of his opponents. That was an infringement of the sovereign rights of a neighboring State, an unjustifiable assumption of power on our part which excited the uneasiness and suspicion of other American nations, and gave the Mexicans a righteous ground for distrust and hostility. Because of this original mistake the administration has found itself in a false position, and its only apparent Mexican policy has been to drive Huerta from power.

And so we have gone on acquiescing in the murder of Americans and the destruction of their property, encouraging bandits and revolution, furnishing arms and ammunition to rebels who devastated whole sections and maintained themselves only by extortion and robbery, and giving our moral support to leaders who ignored the laws of civilization and humanity—leaders who carry on their so-called warfare entirely in contravention of the laws of humanity and civilization, of which the newspaper dispatches this morning from Paredon give us a new and graphic illustration. And then, not succeeding in defeating Huerta by encouraging his enemies, we finally made an issue over the manner of firing a salute, and began war because dissatisfied with the form of an apology.

I have all along believed that whether or not the purpose of the administration was war that was the logical result of its policy, and I regret that it has finally come on such a trivial and technical issue. I venture to say that the records of the State and War Departments during the past nine months will show many more serious and justifiable grounds for intervention.

But the war has come and its prosecution requires the appropriations provided in this bill, and no matter how much I may disapprove the policy which brought it on or how much I may deprecate the pretext on which it was based I recognize that we are committed to it, and I am disposed henceforth to forget my disapproval, to abandon my criticism, and to aid in every way I can to make the war short, decisive, and successful. A successful war, of course, brings prestige and power and popularity to the administration and party which conducts it, but that is no reason why the minority should antagonize it and I pledge my loyal support.

Fortunately, however, for the country our predicament has excited the sympathy of the South American States, and they have suggested mediation. To me that is a most auspicious and encouraging event. It is not simply that it may relieve us of a war expensive in blood and treasure and from which we could gain nothing in glory or reputation or material reward. Beyond that, and as important, it recognizes in a most practical, effective, and pregnant way the sisterhood of the nations on this hemisphere and that peace is for the interest of all. Most wars would be prevented if time could elapse and blood cool before a fancied affront to honor should be avenged by the appeal to brute force. Now that both parties have taken time to reflect it is unthinkable that two nations should insist that slight or individual offenses are sufficient cause for the death of brave men. I welcome most heartily this entrance of the South American Republics as envoys and advocates of peace. I am almost envious that it is they and not we who have taken this epoch-making step toward a pacific reconciliation, and I hope it is a harbinger of a general spirit of mutual interest and friendliness and responsibility throughout this hemisphere. It is a fresh and wholesome innovation, it recognizes our community of interest, and it can not fail to give a broader meaning and potency to that Pan American spirit which for years we have endeavored to nurture and stimulate, and it may go far to bring about a better understanding and a warmer sympathy with the Republics south of us. Surely we, as the most powerful member of the family, can go farthest in search of peace and accommodation without our courage being questioned.

And yet, although this mediation ought not to fail, I recognize that possibility. I agree that it is prudent to be prepared for war, and so I vote for these warlike appropriations. The administration shall have my hearty support in prosecuting the war if it continues, no matter how unnecessary and regrettable I may consider it. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. How much time did I use, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used 7 minutes. The gentleman from California is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] in the opinion that under existing circumstances it is absolutely necessary to vote the appropriations contained in this bill for the Military Establishment. But when one peruses the large deficiency in the item of subsistence for the Army it must become more apparent that the Baltimore platform of the Democratic Party is just plain "molasses to catch flies" despite the positive preelection assurances to the contrary that were made by the present Chief Executive of this country.

We upon the Republican side of this Chamber have heard that platitudinous document, framed largely for vote-catching purposes, repeatedly repudiated and denounced by its own progenitors. For instance, we have been told by some of the prominent Democrats on this floor that the tolls-exemption plank for American ships engaged in the coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal was "sneaked in" rather surreptitiously, somehow, while the distinguished secretary of the committee which drafted that provision of the platform, speaking in another body at the other end of this Capitol, positively asserts that not alone did all the members of that committee approve it consciously and with their eyes open, but that no less a personage than the uncrowned but universally acknowledged "boss" of that convention, the present distinguished Secretary of State, not only gave it his unqualified approval, but that the latter even suggested that it be strengthened and made more effective by the addition of a provision favoring the positive exclusion of railroad-owned ships from the Isthmian waterway.

"Molasses to catch flies!" Mr. Chairman, the Democratic platform is covered with it, and a mighty cheap grade of molasses it is at that. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Just listen to this gem. I read from page 4 of the Democratic Textbook, 1912:

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

The high cost of living is a serious problem in every American home. The Republican Party, in its platform, attempts to escape from responsibility for present conditions by denying that they are due to a protective tariff. We take issue with them on this subject and charge that excessive prices result in a large measure from the high tariff laws enacted and maintained by the Republican Party and from trusts and commercial conspiracies fostered and encouraged by such laws, and we assert that no substantial relief can be secured for the people until import duties on the necessaries of life are materially reduced and these criminal conspiracies broken up.

Talk about "talking for buncombe." Here you have it illustrated in all its pristine splendor, in all its resplendent glory. Here you have a sample of pure, unadulterated, unmistakable Democratic campaign bunk [laughter on the Republican side]—a veritable sea of "molasses"—that fooled so many voters at the last presidential election. But you will never fool them again. The American voters feel like that Indian, who, having once been deceived by a paleface, bluntly grunted:

White man fool Indian first time, shame on him. White man fool Indian second time, shame on Indian.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes, carries an item on page 3, which reads:

Subsistence: For subsistence of the Army, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, $1,255,538.90.

In explaining that deficiency the Quartermaster General of the United States Army appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and testified before that committee. He explained the deficiency by saying that it was due to three principal causes.

I read from the hearings, on page 10:

Gen. ALESHIRE. The deficiency in the subsistence appropriation is due to three principal causes—one is the increase in the number of enlisted men, another is the increase in the cost of the ration, and the third is the purchase of some supplies under emergency in the early part of the fiscal year to be sent to Honolulu. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. How much of this is due to the first cause—that is, to the increased number of men?

Gen. ALESHIRE. The number of men of the line estimated for for the fiscal year 1914 was 72,673, and the estimated cost of the ration was 24.09 cents. The amount of the estimate for the fiscal year 1914 for these men was $6,390,027.88. The average number of men to whom we furnished rations for the first six months was 71,926 enlisted men, and the average cost of the ration for the first six months was 24.63 cents.

Mr. GILLETT. How much did you estimate?

Gen. ALESHIRE. We estimated 24.09 cents, a difference of 0.54 of a cent in the ration. The amount required for the first six months on that basis was $3,233,055.71. That left the amount available for the second six months $3,099,721.92. The enlisted strength during the second six months was 80,676, and the cost of the ration was 24.63 cents. The amount required for the second six months was $3,626,366.03, showing a deficiency for the men of the line on account of the increased number of men and the increased cost of the ration of $606,794.46.

Here, Mr. Chairman, we have the testimony of one of the ablest, most efficient officers of the United States Government, before one of the greatest committees of the House, to the effect that the Underwood tariff law, during its first six months of operation, has not reduced the cost of living a fraction of a cent in the United States. According to the party platform, of course, the cost of living was to be reduced as soon as the reduction of the tariff was to be made. But facts are more convincing than theories. The doctrinaires and the theorists who wrote the plank of the Democratic platform on the high cost of living have lived to see their theories proved to be entirely unreliable and utterly false.

Bear in mind that Uncle Sam is probably the biggest single purchaser of food products in the markets of this country. Bear in mind that he probably purchases those products for a less cost than anyone else, because he buys under contracts, and the competition to secure these contracts is exceedingly keen. And yet he, buying enormous quantities of food products that enter into the rations for his soldiers, has not been able to secure a reduction in the cost of living of his soldiers, notwithstanding the platitudes and theories contained in the Democratic platform to the effect that the protective tariff is responsible for the present high cost of living.

Gentlemen of the Democratic side of the House, why do you not acknowledge that your theories are wrong? You knew that the tariff had nothing to do with the high cost of living when you wrote that "high-cost-of-living" plank in your party platform. You knew that plank was simply "molasses to catch flies." The true principle was stated in the Republican platform. The increase of the cost of living is a matter of world-wide experience.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. If the tariff does not raise prices, how does it protect anybody?

Mr. KAHN. It has absolutely nothing to do with the high cost of living, because the complaint that the cost of living is going up rapidly is just as pronounced in free-trade England as in the United States.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; but that, of course, does not answer the question. The question was, If the tariff does not raise prices, how does it protect anybody?

Mr. KAHN. That has been shown so frequently——

Mr. GORDON. Show it again.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman undoubtedly knows it is elementary that the law of supply and demand fixes prices. The tariff has absolutely nothing to do with fixing them. The tariff can keep out the products of a cheap manufacturing country, but it does not necessarily fix the price of the imported article in this country. That fact has been demonstrated over and over again. A protective tariff simply aims to and is intended to keep out of the country the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by cheap labor in a foreign country that would be thrown into competition with the goods, wares, and merchandise produced by the higher-paid labor of this country.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question only?

Mr. KAHN. For a question only.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it a fact that the cost of living has increased in America for the last 10 years at a greater ratio than in any other country in the world with the exception of Canada?

Mr. KAHN. I am not prepared to admit that that is a fact. I know it is a fact that the cost of living has increased in every country in the world, whether that country be a free-trade country or a protective-tariff country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman that the consular reports show that the necessaries of life have advanced more in every other country in the world in the last 10 years than in the United States. The gentleman can not pick out a single consular report which shows the contrary.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FERRIS). The gentleman from California declines to yield further.

Mr. KAHN. I know the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has made a study of the subject, and I thank him for his contribution to this colloquy.

Mr. Chairman, the original estimates for subsistence for the Army in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914 were based on a ration costing 24.09 cents. During the last six months of the fiscal year 1914, with the Underwood tariff in full force and effect, the cost of the ration is 24.63 cents, an increase of fifty-four hundredths of a cent per ration. And when you remember there are 85,000 enlisted men in the line of the Army, exclusive of the Military Academy, the enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, the Quartermaster Corps, and the Philippine Scouts, you can readily see that this increase of 5.4 mills per ration, though trifling in the case of the single individual, in the aggregate runs up to nearly $200,000 per annum, which the taxpayers of the United States are compelled to pay, the promise of the Democrats that their tariff law would lower the cost of living notwithstanding.

Mr. Chairman, one of the other causes for the large deficiency in the item for subsistence of the Army is due to the increase of the enlisted strength of the Army. I believe that the administration was justified in increasing the enlisted strength. It was undoubtedly a wise precaution. But I do believe that when increases of this kind are made the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and especially the chairman of that committee, ought to be taken into the confidence of the administration and advised about the necessity for the increase, all the more so because the House of Representatives must, in the final analysis, furnish the pay, subsistence, and other allowances for the increased number of men. That has not been done in this instance. I hope that in the future, if additional men are called for, the administration will at least take into its confidence the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House [Mr. HAY]. Congress is a coordinate branch of this Government. Its responsibilities are as great as those of the Executive department. It has a right to know, and ought to know, the reasons for the increase of the Army, with all the attendant additional expense to the taxpayers of the United States. I have served on the Committee on Military Affairs of this House for nearly 10 years. During that period a number of occasions arose when it became necessary for the officials of the executive branches of this Government to convey confidential information to the membership of that committee. I do not believe that the confidence so reposed in the committee was ever betrayed. But the fact that the information had been given to the committee made it much easier to secure the necessary legislation. Politics have rarely entered into the deliberations of that committee. In the present emergency I am satisfied that every member thereof will be ready to vote every dollar and furnish every instrumentality that may be necessary to carry out the plans of the administration in dealing with the situation on our southern border.

Mr. Chairman, reference was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to the situation in Mexico. It is an unfortunate condition that confronts us there. It is a condition that the great majority of the Members of this House undoubtedly did not desire to see brought into existence. But we are there, whether we like it or not. And yet I was greatly surprised this morning to see an article in the Saturday Evening Post of May 23, 1914, which appears on the front page of that journal, and which purports to be a statement by the President of the United States. It appears under the caption—

Mexico. The record of a conversation with President Wilson. By Samuel G. Blythe.

During that conversation the President is reported as having said this:

Did you see that dispatch we gave out, from Consul General Hanna, which detailed his experiences with the army at Torreon? It was a sort of a diary of his adventures and a record of what he saw. We gave it all out; but the latter part of it was not widely printed, for the first part of it was full of bloody details of the battle. I suppose (and he smiled whimsically again)—I suppose the editors felt there was no particular interest in the peaceful and gratifying information that was in the latter portion of the dispatch.

Well, if you read that dispatch you learned that Mr. Hanna was most agreeably surprised and greatly gratified by the treatment Villa's men gave their prisoners; how they endeavor to live up to the rules of civilized warfare; how they were constantly on the lookout for new information that would relieve them of the stigma of being barbarians. This merely shows that these people, if they get the chance, are capable of learning and are anxious to learn.

"Praise from Sir Hubert is praise indeed." Now, take a look at the picture of Villa and his followers, as printed in the Washington Post of this morning. Listen to this:

VILLA KILLS GEN. OZORNO AND STAFF—OFFICIAL REPORT BOASTS OF EXECUTIONS—REBELS MARK LEADING SPANIARDS OF MEXICO CITY FOR DEATH—THIRTY-THREE OFFICERS WHO SURRENDERED AT ZERTUCHE, NEAR PAREDON, "IMMEDIATELY" SLAIN, DECLARES MESSAGE FROM THE FRONT—MORE THAN 700 SOLDIER PRISONERS, AND 9 CANNON AND MUCH AMMUNITION CAPTURED—VILLA INCENSED AGAINST SPANIARDS BECAUSE OF ACTIVITY OF TORREON EXILES IN EL PASO.

JUAREZ, MEXICO, May 20.

Vengeance and the lust for blood are the dominating factors in the battle which "Pancho" Villa is waging against the federals at Saltillo. Apparently, too, the rebel general is willing that the world shall hear of his bloody methods.

From Villa's private secretary, Luis A. Benavides, to-day was received a dispatch stating that Gen. Ozorno, of the federal army, and his entire staff of 32 officers were captured by Villa at Zertuche, 15 miles from Saltillo, and that all were immediately put to death.

CAPTURED AT ZERTUCHE.

Their capture and execution followed a battle at Zertuche yesterday afternoon, in which the federal army, endeavoring to reach Saltillo after its defeat at Paredon, ran into Villa's army, and was defeated with severe losses.

Expecting to be treated as prisoners of war under civilized rules of warfare, the federal commander, it is said, surrendered with his staff. He and his officers were killed on the field as soon as they had been made prisoners.

REPORTS TELL OF MURDERS.

The official report says:

"It is known that Gens. Miguel Alvarez and Ignacio Munoz fell in the combat. Gen. Ozorno and a good number of federal officials were executed."

Regarding the fight at Zertuche, another official report says, in part: "There was captured also a general and 32 officials who composed his staff. All were executed immediately."

DEATH FOR SPANIARDS.

All Spaniards in Mexico City are to be expelled from the city and from Mexico as Pancho Villa takes the capital, and those who have been active in aiding Huerta are to be put to death. This was stated here to-day by friends of Villa, who say the rebel general has a list of all Spaniards in Mexico City who have been active in assisting Huerta, and each is marked for death.

BRANDS SPANIARDS AS FOES.

Villa's anger has been aroused, it is claimed, by the activities of the Spanish junta in El Paso, composed of leaders of the Torreon colony, who had been driven from the country by Villa. This junta, rebels claim, is working in conjunction with Spaniards in Mexico City and is giving financial aid and information to the federals in their fight against the rebels. This, the rebels say, causes Villa to consider the Spaniards enemies to the rebel cause, and he will show them no mercy when they fall into his hands.

The 700 or more men of the federal army who surrendered at Zertuche were sent to Torreon, and rebels say they will be released or taken into the rebel army.

I wonder if our countrymen, after having read that record of wanton butchery and savage slaughter, will be "greatly gratified by the treatment Villa's men gave their prisoners"?

Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary to pursue the matter further at this time. The attitude of the administration in its Mexican policy is being scrutinized and discussed in every section of the United States. The tariff policy, the repeal of tolls-exemption policy, the trust-regulation policy, the currency-reform policy, and all the other policies of the administration and the Democratic Party will come in for their share of criticism or defense. You on the Democratic side will be called upon to give an account of your stewardship.

The reduction in the cost of living, which you so glibly promised, has not materialized. The good times that were to flow as the result of the enactment of your economic doctrines have failed to make themselves manifest. Everywhere there is dullness in trade. Everywhere there is idleness among the toilers and workers of this country. You have been weighed in the balance and found wanting. And the voters will show their resentment in no unmistakable language when they go to the polls on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of next November.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this further urgent deficiency appropriation bill carries $6,770,000, of which $6,308,000 is for military purposes. These increased expenditures for military purposes are not in the main made necessary by the present active operations about Vera Cruz, although some of them, such as the rent of transports, are made necessary by those operations. They are in the main made necessary by reason of the increase of the enlisted force which was made some time ago, and very properly, in view of the Mexican situation.

In my opinion, the Secretary of War, acting, I assume, on the advice of the President, did the proper thing in increasing the enlisted force in view of the general unsettled conditions on our southern border. This additional appropriation is made necessary very largely by reason of that increase in the enlisted force.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has already called attention to the fact that the increase is partly made necessary by reason of the rather curious fact, in view of the promises and predictions of our Democratic friends in their platform and in their campaign, that the cost of living has advanced. The Army ration now costs us 0.54 of a cent more than it did when the Democrats attacked the Republican Party and its policies on account of the high cost of living. In other words, there has been an advance in the cost of living in the staples that constitutes the Army ration of approximately 2 per cent. We all know that the increase of the cost of living in many other lines, not staples, has been very much greater.

This general advance in the cost of living is notorious, known to all of us; but here is a striking illustration of it in the purchases of the Government in a very large way. These appropriations are, as I have said, necessary on account of the conditions in Mexico. We all hope that those conditions will grow better. We trust that the mediators now in session at Niagara Falls will be able to bring about a settlement that will bring peace. We pray that they may, even in the midst of our fears that they will not.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] some days ago addressed the House relative to the administration's policy toward Mexico. Unfortunately I did not have the pleasure of listening to that entertaining speech. I know nothing of it except from extracts I read in the papers, and I can not secure any better or more complete information by reason of the fact that the gentleman from Texas has not as yet inserted his speech in the RECORD.

In that speech it was reported that he said "We are following the President; we do not know just where he is leading us to or what he proposes to do, but we are following him." I think he expressed some doubt about the wisdom of some things that had been done. But it was far from the gentleman from Texas to assert his opinion with regard to these matters as against the opinion and acts of the Chief Executive. He was simply following; but he has not followed far enough to enlighten us through the RECORD as to just how far he proposes to follow the administration's policy.

Mr. BELL of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BELL of California. Will the gentleman inform the House as to what he thinks of this policy, whether it is pursuing war by peaceful methods or whether it is pursuing a peaceful situation by warlike methods? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Both, I think. A long time ago, some months ago, I expressed my disapproval of the administration's Mexican policy. I did not do it as a jingo but as a lover of peace. I then said that, in my opinion, the attitude which the administration had taken of declining to recognize the government which had been established in Mexico and of allying itself with the so-called constitutionalists, the attitude of indirect intervention, was one that must inevitably lead to war. It has steadily led in that direction, and we stand to-day hanging on the verge of what may be a bloody and a costly war, though we hope not.

I want to make a few observations with regard to some things the struggles down there have developed. The Department of State or the Department of War, one or both, are, I understand, compiling a biography of a gentleman notorious in those bloody encounters by the name of Villa. The Senator from New York some days ago made a most valuable contribution to that biography. I want to add to that delightful character sketch just one little item, taken from a letter received by a Member of this House from the State of Pennsylvania, Mr. EDMONDS, from a friend and a former partner of his in Chihuahua. In the letter, referring to occurrences down in that country, he reminded Mr. EDMONDS of their former mutual acquaintance with this gentlemanly murderer, rapist, and bandit. He said, among other things:

You will remember, too, that Villa is the same honorable party who murdered our foreman, Villalobos, at Cata Tica mine in 1909.

I am informed that this constitutionalist patriot, friend of the administration, whom our official representatives are reported as fondly embracing—this gentleman on the occasion in question took the life of a fellow Mexican by sneaking up on him through the chaparral as he rode by on his way to his home with his month's wages. He shot him, killed and robbed him, and threw his body in a neighboring arroyo. Of course this is but a relatively unimportant incident in the life of this patriotic constitutionalist, whom the administration is depending on to establish orderly, constitutional government in Mexico. It is just one small incident in his life of crime and pillage, murder and rape. This morning the papers bring us the news we had expected, that this savage bandit had returned to his former and favorite practice of shooting his enemies, disarmed enemies—honorable, brave, generous patriot that he is! Oh what a figure he is to select as the instrument of constitutional government under law! One of our best and ablest consuls, it is reported in a recent paper, thinks of resigning, the reason given being that he, at least, is still enough of an American that he can not stomach the performances of some of our representatives down there in their fond embraces and their constant aid and encouragement of Villa and his kind.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] wants to follow the administration. I wonder if he, gallant and brave gentleman that I know him to be, desires to be understood as following the administration in what occurred at Tampico. Tampico was attacked by the rebels, and several hundred Americans were gathered in a hotel and felt reasonably safe because in the neighboring river, but a short distance away, lay three American gunboats, with their guns shotted, their decks lined with sand bags, and the marines with quick-firing guns alert behind them. Our forces had just taken Vera Cruz, and the news had been flashed to Tampico that the invader had landed; that he was shooting Mexicans. Meanwhile the rebel forces were thundering at the gates, and so the cry went round, "They have invaded our land at Vera Cruz and shot down our people; they have furnished the guns with which the rebels are pounding at our doors," and out of this grew an anti-American demonstration. The mobs gathered around the hotel where these Americans—men, women, and little children—were gathered, depending upon marines and gunboats for protection. And then what happened? While the mobs howled and battered at the doors, while every horrid and vile threat that those savage and angry Mexicans could conjure up were being shouted at these imprisoned refugees and strong men stormed in their impotent wrath and women—American women—and children cowed in terror, those American gunboats, on command of the Secretary of the Navy, three times repeated over the protest of the American admiral, weighed anchor and steamed out to sea, leaving 2,000 Americans—men, women, and children—defenseless in the face of that howling mob, inflamed to madness because we were attacking their countrymen at Vera Cruz and had allowed the shipment of arms to the rebels who were attacking them and threatening their lives and property. Fortunately, there was a German gunboat and German commander at hand, and when our own brave men had been ordered away the German commander ordered the mob dispersed, which was done. This German commander then sent his men to escort the American men, women, and children to his boat. Fortunately, there was an English ship and an English officer at hand to assist in the rescue of our people. And so when these Americans had been deserted by their people they were defended and protected by the flags of Germany and of Great Britain. When our citizens 2,000 of them, were rescued by German and English officers and sailors and taken out to sea in German and English boats they found 17 American dreadnaughts lying at anchor—2,000 Americans, stalwart men, fair women, little children, in danger of death, torture, and dishonor—17 of the finest ships afloat, 10 miles away, 3 gunboats, manned and shotted, weighing anchor and sailing out to sea, leaving them to their fate. Does the gentleman from Texas follow the administration in that incident?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What is the significance of the incident when 500 of the refugees reached New Orleans and passing an English vessel flying the British flag frantically cheered the English flag?

Mr. MONDELL. They did. They properly acknowledged their debt of gratitude to those who had rescued them. When we hear the bands play the Star-Spangled Banner we uncover, and if we are true and loyal Americans our pulse is quickened and our emotions are profoundly stirred; but how, think you, will the playing of this national anthem in the future affect the 2,000 Americans who, at Tampico, in the face of a howling mob, saw the anchors weighed and the flag sail away? Gentlemen may smile. Gentlemen may think it does not amount to anything, but I want to suggest that if our people are to continue to be patriotic, if we are going to resent insults to the flag, if we are going to spend our money and our boys are going to give their lives in the defense of the flag, it is going to be because the flag stands always, as it has in the past, for justice, righteousness, and the protection of American citizens. [Applause.]

Can we hope for continued devotion to the flag from people whom the flag has deserted? Can we expect a continuation of honest pride in American citizenship from those to whom the flag has failed to furnish protection? Shall we readily efface from the memory of these Tampico refugees, these men, women, and children abandoned to the mob, the recollection of that incident, the mortal terror of the situation, the amazement at their abandonment, the crushing blow to their national pride?

It may be that the arrest and detention for a short period of an officer and a few marines who, while the defenders of Tampico were battling against the onslaughts of their enemies, landed at a wharf where landing was prohibited, constitutes an insult to the flag warranting acts of war costing the lives of a score of brave young Americans and of hundreds of Mexicans, but I have my doubts about it. If that arrest and detention under those circumstances, duly apologized for, cast discredit on the flag and the uniform, what shall we say of orders that called brave men from their posts of defense, that withdrew our flag and our guns from the protection of our citizens and their families in the hour of their mortal peril?

Above all things I am thankful, and from the information I have I am satisfied, that no man wearing the American uniform was responsible for that desertion. Three different times, so I am told, the officer in command protested the orders sent him, and only obeyed when those orders were made final and imperative from Washington. How he must have felt, how the brave men under him must have felt, as they sailed away can be readily imagined. This Tampico incident is so astounding, so utterly contrary to all American traditions, that some of our people have found it difficult to credit it, much less to understand it. But when one views it in the light of the policy which the administration has steadily pursued toward the Mexican situation, it is simple enough.

The one end and aim and only purpose of the administration's policy has evidently been the downfall and elimination of Huerta. The taking of Vera Cruz had so inflamed the Mexican mind, military and civilian, constitutionalist and federal, that there was a strong probability that the contending forces at Tampico might join against the common enemy; that the rebels might cease their assault upon Tampico and thereby disarrange the administration's policy of playing one force against the other as a means to the elimination of Huerta. Forgotten or ignored was the duty of protecting the lives and the honor of our people in the consuming desire to carry out the administration plan. And so the flags were dipped, the anchors weighed, and while the mobs howled, hurled their insults, and battered at the doors, our people were abandoned to their fate. If there is any other explanation than this of the Tampico incident, let some one give it. If this was not a cold-blooded abandonment in carrying out the policy of the administration to bring about the downfall of the Federal Government in Mexico without regard to loss of life or property, I should like to know what excuse there was for it.

I shall insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks a statement handed me by John I. Newell, a stalwart, honest American citizen, who was at Tamipco at the time the incidents I have referred to occurred. The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF JOHN I. NEWELL, OF TAMPICO, MEXICO, CONCERNING THE PROTECTION ACCORDED TO AMERICANS AT TAMPICO.

In the fore part of the year 1912 President Taft, personally or through his representatives, gave instructions to the Consular Service throughout Mexico, advising all Americans who could leave Mexico to do so, turning over their properties to the American consul in each district. This notice was addressed to those who considered themselves to be in danger. At Tampico at this time no danger existed in the minds of Americans and no one left. As a result of this notice placards were posted throughout the Mexican Republic by Mexicans in Spanish, which read, in effect, "See the cowardly Americans run."

During the summer of 1912 rifles, such as were formerly used in the United States Army, were sent in large numbers to consuls throughout Mexico with the consent of the Mexican Government, to be sold to American residents in Mexico for 18 pesos apiece, including 240 rounds of ammunition. These were issued to those who considered that they needed the protection of these guns. There was still no trouble at Tampico, but many availed themselves of the opportunity to secure arms.

In October or November, 1913, the Americans were called into conference, at which the United States Government seemed to be represented and arrangements were made for the protection of American lives in Tampico in case they might be endangered by rebel attacks, which were at that time anticipated. Buildings were chosen which would be used for the concentration of the defenders; arms were arranged for, and a number of American men were asked to volunteer to perform certain services, and they responded unanimously.

On the 10th or 11th of December, 1913, the city of Tampico was attacked by rebel forces in strong numbers. These forces captured the suburban towns of Dona Cecelia and Arbol Grande, which are situated within 2 miles of Tampico and are regarded as a part of the city. Admiral Fletcher, then in command of the United States fleet which was at Tampico undertook to form a neutral zone, and published throughout the consulate the boundaries of such zone, which included several city blocks, and to which Americans were requested to retire. The federal commander of the Mexican forces refused to honor Admiral Fletcher's demand for such a zone, and the demand was withdrawn or at least not enforced. On the evening of December 12 Admiral Fletcher wrote a letter to the consul, stating that there seemed to be a mistake on the part of Americans; that they seemed to think that they might defend themselves, but the letter went on to state that their only protection was on the United States gunboats, which lay in the Panuco River within a few hundred feet of the customhouse at Tampico, with guns covering the town, and all those who desired protection were invited to go on the gunboats. Many hundred American women and children availed themselves of the privilege and were taken into the Gulf and transferred to the large battleships there. Admiral Fletcher sent a flag lieutenant ashore to emphasize the letter, and this gentleman stated in effect that Americans had no right to protect themselves, even though their homes were entered by the mob of either of the contending forces. I heard this statement myself in the lobby of the Southern Hotel.

Tampico was again attacked by the rebels during the fore part of April, and the attack continued for seven days. When matters seemed crucial again Admiral Mayo, then in charge, invited Americans aboard the gunboats, and they were transferred to the battleships in the Gulf. At this time three gunboats, namely, the Dolphin, the Chester, and the Des Moines, were in the river within a few hundred feet of Tampico. Under this invitation over a thousand passes were issued by the consulate to Americans, who took refuge on these boats. During this attack occurred the famous flag incident.

The tension was great in Tampico, the federals being very bitter toward all Americans, believing them to be rebel sympathizers, and stating openly that the rebel forces were armed with arms secured in the United States. Many Americans were arrested daily for no reason and were suspected of being rebel spies. The consul was kept busy securing their release from prison. In two or three days the people taken on the battleships were landed again, it being thought the trouble was over. A day or two later a notice was sent to the consulate, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, telling all Americans to repair to the gunboats by 4 o'clock. It was no more than posted before it was ordered torn down by the naval authorities. No one in Tampico understood why this notice was posted or why it was withdrawn, although it was stated that the gunboats were about to leave the river. On Monday, April 20, in the evening, Admiral Mayo received instructions to withdraw all gunboats from the river and proceed with them to Vera Cruz, leaving the Des Moines, however, in the gulf outside Tampico. The three gunboats in the river had been stripped for action, with guns shotted and bags of sand placed around them for protection. The marines were ready for instant landing, and this condition had prevailed for about one week, causing an increased hatred on the part of Mexicans, who believed that this was done as a threat to them, and who also believed that the Americans in Tampico were thoroughly protected as long as the gunboats remained. Admiral Mayo protested against the removal of the gunboats at least three times, and I have every reason to believe he stated that his withdrawing the boats would subject hundreds and thousands of Americans to extreme danger. I know that the American consul sent a long message of protest and also stating the extreme danger that would arise to all Americans there. These messages did not avail, and at 9.30 o'clock, the morning of April 31, the last of the gunboats left the river. The Americans immediately felt themselves to be in extreme danger, and hurried notices were sent throughout the oil fields and farming districts ordering all the oil operators and farmers to drop everything and come into Tampico. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon the Americans for the first time became aware of the taking of Vera Cruz. They learned this through posters put out by the Mexican authorities saying that the American invader had come and had landed at Vera Cruz, and calling on all patriotic Mexicans to rally for the defense of the city. Arms and ammunition were given freely to all volunteers.

The American consul had not been notified of the taking of Vera Cruz and was not in communication with our battleships which were now located 9 miles away in the Gulf. At 4.30 mobs began to form, incited by speeches made by leading Mexican lawyers and doctors. They were incited to kill all Americans and to tear down the American flags. These mobs kept increasing in size, and three different attacks were made on some buildings occupied by Americans. A hundred and fifty American men, women, and children were guarded at the Southern Hotel. Determined efforts were made to batter down the doors of the hotel. It was shot into. Windows were broken, and no relief was given until the German commander of the German gunboat Dresden sent word to Gen. Zaragosa, of the federal forces, ordering him to disperse the mob, and if it was not done he would land German marines himself. This German commander then sent two of his officers to the Southern Hotel and to other places to take the American women and children to his boats. This was about 2 o'clock in the morning of April 22. This was done voluntarily on the part of the German commander without any communication whatever from the American fleet. Earlier in the evening the consulate tried to get into communication with Admiral Mayo by wireless from the English boat, but the English commander refused the request, stating that Mexico and the United States were at war and England was neutral. Afterwards Mayo and the English commander did communicate at a time when Mayo expected to land marines to protect the Americans in town, but the English commander protested, saying that it would endanger the English who were ashore, and that he would join with the German commander in protecting Americans. During April 22 and 23 over 2,500 Americans were taken out of Tampico by boats flying the German and English flags and in charge of German and English officers. It was the only way that they could get to safety. The English officer on one of the boats stated to the Americans in a speech that it was not his duty to do this, but that he did so inasmuch as our own country had deserted us and humanity demanded that he should take care of us. Flags were torn down and spit upon, women were insulted with every conceivable term of insult, and so were the men during the movement to the boats.

The feeling of every American coming from Tampico is that he was deserted by his country. He knows that he was in no danger as long as the quarrel was between the Mexicans, but after the United States took note of the flag incident and landed at Vera Cruz the hatred of the federals against all Americans became intense, and the protection was removed from us at a time when it was at its height without any notice to us and without any invitation to seek the protection which had been extended to us before.

I made this statement gladly and freely, believing it is proper for parties to whom it is given to know these facts.

JOHN I. NEWELL.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Washington, D. C., old building, Bureau of Engraving and Printing: For new floors, suspended ceilings, repairs, painting, reinforcing floors, vault equipment, partitions, plumbing, conduit and wiring, and other necessary repairs, to adapt the old building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the accommodation of various Treasury offices, to continue available during the fiscal year 1915, $29,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I will ask the gentleman from New York what is the intention in reference to the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing and what offices are to go in there in addition to those already provided for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. All of the offices of the Treasury Department now occupying rented buildings will in the future occupy the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. MANN. And no other offices?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not.

Mr. MANN. I thought in addition to those that the Federal Reserve Board was to have a portion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Federal Reserve Board is to be accommodated in the Treasury Building, and they are moving certain offices out of the Treasury Building into the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. MANN. Then there are others than those now in rented buildings?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the Stamp Division and the Internal-Revenue Bureau. I think are being moved out.

Mr. MANN. Is it likely that this building is going to be now permanently occupied? I had some hopes that at some time the Government might tear that down. It is an eyesore there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, so did all of the other iconoclasts under the Commission of Fine Arts, but those who believe that a building which cost in the neighborhood of a million dollars should be utilized have not such reckless disregard of these things.

Mr. MANN. We have the Washington Monument on the one side, the Potomac Park on the other, and in between we have this old building and some nursery grounds and greenhouses, strawberry beds, for the use of the Executive Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has overlooked the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; that is not between the Washington Monument Grounds and the Potomac Park.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a very attractive building to anybody who has an artistic, esthetic taste. Of course the gentleman, who was brought up in Chicago——

Mr. MANN. Of course I was brought up in the wild and wooly West and have no esthetic taste.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And those who have no notion of art wish to destroy public property quite unnecessarily.

Mr. MANN. Why, the whole thing is an eyesore—these greenhouses, these strawberry beds, and so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman should not potter around such places and his eyes would not get sore. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, this gentleman is fortunate enough occasionally to have some one who possesses a machine to take him out in that locality, and then once in a while he walks himself and pries around these nursery grounds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The old bureau building is not offensive from any standpoint. There may be some of the surroundings that perhaps should be cleaned up, but that is a delightful and satisfactory building.

Mr. MANN. I supposed when we built the new building it was because we wanted to get rid of the old building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it was to accommodate the employees, who were crowded there so greatly as to make it undesirable.

Mr. MANN. Then we could have built the new building one-half the size, and continued to use that building which we already have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We could never do anything like that with the Government.

Mr. MANN. Well——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Prevention of epidemics: To enable the President, in case only of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, typhus fever, yellow fever, smallpox, bubonic plague, Chinese plague or black death, or trachoma, to aid State and local boards, or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same, and in such emergency in the execution of any quarantine laws which may be then in force, to continue available during the fiscal year 1915, $100,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is this Public Health Service item, to prevent epidemics, in the language of the existing law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the language of the existing provision.

Mr. MANN. I meant the language of the existing appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Would any part of this appropriation be available for investigation of the mosquito as related to epidemics?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not; it is to be utilized to provide the necessary field force required in the case of epidemics.

Mr. MOORE. It is possible an epidemic might start through the mosquito carrying fever from one person to another, as we are told it did in Panama. On several occasions, when this question has arisen during the consideration of the Agricultural bill, we have been told the proper place for an inquiry as to the effect of the mosquito bite would be the Health Service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Public Health Service has an appropriation of $250,000 for investigating the diseases of man.

Mr. MOORE. But the gentleman can not say whether any portion of this $100,000 will be devoted to an inquiry of the kind I have suggested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not. This money is required to supply additional services, due to the fact that at some places in Mexico from which refugees are coming there have been indications of yellow fever, and a few cases of plague have been found in Havana during the past six months, and it is to provide additional precautions in the quarantine service as a result of these conditions.

Mr. MOORE. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture told us when his bill was before the House that some money was being spent in a few sections of the United States—some in South Carolina, I think, in one county—in an undertaking to suppress the mosquito, and I think some money may have been spent for that same purpose under the Department of Agriculture in Louisiana. I am not sure as to that, but the chairman indicated, if the question arose again, he would undertake to see that no appropriation was made through the Department of Agriculture for that purpose; that the mosquito problem was purely a human problem, and the question was one to be considered by the Bureau of Health.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the Government of the United States is not going into the business of trying to exterminate the mosquitoes of the country. It has done enough things it should not do.

Mr. MOORE. The United States expends a good deal of money undertaking to prevent epidemics among cattle; it expends money for the boll weevil, the cattle tick, the Mediterranean fly, the hog cholera, and things of that kind which affect the health of animals; but there is no provision, so far as I can find, for protecting the life of individuals—human beings—as against this greatest of human pests, the mosquito. Surely the mosquito is as much an evil as the boll weevil or the tick or any one of these strange moths that seem to affect agriculture in some way or other——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some day or other we will have a Federal investigator for every flea and mosquito in the United States.

Mr. MURDOCK. And do not forget the house fly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the house fly.

Mr. MOORE. Well, in the State of New Jersey they have spent money in the——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; they spent it.

Mr. MOORE (continuing). They spent it and are spending it investigating and trying to suppress the mosquito. The mosquito is not indigenous to New Jersey, Delaware, or any other State. It is bound to get over the State border, hence it is properly a subject of governmental inquiry. We may raise that question some day, whether the gentleman considers it proper for his committee or not, but I want to find out whether the Health Bureau, in the opinion of the gentleman, is the proper place to locate this matter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it can not use this money to kill mosquitoes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the statements are so often made that Congress appropriates money in order to prevent diseases among animals and will not and does not appropriate money to prevent diseases in human beings that the matter is worthy of some consideration. I understood my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to say that mosquitoes were not indigenous to New Jersey, but certainly when he made that statement he made it with humor. I think mosquitoes are indigenous to all parts of the United States.

Mr. MOORE. I am willing to withdraw the word "indigenous" and make it "special" to New Jersey.

Mr. MANN. Now, we do appropriate money in reference to insects or diseases of animals which are not imported. I do not recall now any special disease of animals which is indigenous to the territory where we appropriate money even for combating them.

We appropriate money for the gypsy moth. Why? To keep it from spreading. We appropriate money in reference to the boll weevil. Why? To keep it from spreading. It is not indigenous to our soil. We would appropriate money in reference to insects or pests which would bring disease upon man, where we can keep those diseases from spreading, as we do in reference to small pox, yellow fever, and various other diseases. And I do not recall now where we do appropriate money in any direction for the purpose directly of combating the disease which is indigenous to the soil or which comes from insect pests which are indigenous to the soil in this country. And it makes quite a distinction. We may appropriate money to help fight a disease, and it is possible we may some time appropriate money to endeavor to kill off all the flies—house, stable, horse, and otherwise—and all the mosquitoes near Philadelphia. I think there is very good reason for that when we go to Atlantic City. But there is this distinction, and we do not, in my judgment, give a preference, as is so frequently stated, to the farm animal over the farmer himself.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. We did appropriate money in one form or another for the suppression of the mosquito on the Panama Canal Zone, as the gentleman is well aware, and we made a world's record in the suppression of the mosquito at that point.

Mr. MANN. Well, the last time I was down on the Panama Canal, which was not so very long ago, in company with some other gentlemen from this House, in the car of the chief engineer of the canal, over at the Gatun Dam, I met more mosquitoes in five minutes than I ever saw anywhere else in the world in the same length of time.

Mr. MOORE. I am afraid the gentleman is taking some of the laurels from Col. Gorgas.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. I am stating some facts which are not popular to state by gentlemen who are connected with the Panama Canal work.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think it unfair that some day this question of educating the public to the manner in which the mosquito can be suppressed should be taken up by the Government? The mosquito is not confined to any one State.

Mr. MANN. I think we are educating the public on the subject now. It takes a large amount of money. The question is whether the General Government itself will undertake the prevention of mosquitoes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Signal Service: For the repair and replacement of equipment and material lost and damaged by fire in the Signal Corps laboratory, Washington, D. C., March 18, 1914, $7,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, is that a new paragraph?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A new paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a little inquiry about this signal service item, or not so much about the item as about the signal service. We passed in the House the other day a bill providing for an aviation corps in the Army. The gentleman knows there have been a number of propositions made at different times in reference to organizing a commission and having an aeronautical laboratory connected with, possibly, the Smithsonian or other institution under the Government. The other propositions have not eventuated in any legislation, and we have a number of bills for purchase of fields for flying, and so forth—aviation. Is the gentleman prepared to make any suggestion in reference to the possibility of giving to this new aviation corps, if this bill passes the Senate, some money with which they can make experiments in flying, or whether it would be preferable, if that should be done, to have it done under a commission not exclusively controlled by the Army?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Smithsonian Institution, of which the gentleman from Illinois is a distinguished regent——

Mr. MANN. Was; not is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was.

Mr. MANN. And I am not so distinguished.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That institution has submitted an estimate of $50,000 for the establishment of an aeronautical laboratory. The suggestion of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution is that in this laboratory there shall be done research work in connection with aviation for both the Army and Navy, and that the work done in the laboratory be strictly of a research character, while any practical development be conducted by the Navy or the Army in their respective services. The suggestion is that the laboratory should be established in that part of the Potomac Park east of the railroad embankment. The plan for the utilization of Potomac Park now provides that it should be a great public playground. The matter is before the Committee on Appropriations, but no conclusion has been reached as to the desirability of action of any character. Whatever may be the desirability of establishing an aeronautical laboratory, personally I believe it should not be put in Potomac Park. That will eventually be the most accessible and desirable park and recreation grounds in the District. I believe it will not enhance its utility for such purpose by developing there an establishment in which experimental work must necessarily be conducted.

My recollection is that the War Department had an establishment at College Park, Md.; but since the troops have been on the border I understand they have had two fields, one at San Antonio and one at San Diego, where they have been experimenting. My own impression is that if the bill which passed through the House the other day upon the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is enacted into law, it will probably be necessary eventually to provide some facilities for original research work in connection with the development of the apparatus to be utilized by that corps. I am not prepared to say whether it is desirable to place that in the War Department or in the Navy Department or into some joint control or under the control of an institution such as the Smithsonian.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear the gentleman honestly say what he does about any utilization of any part of the Potomac Park as an aeronautical field. I am opposed myself to putting any kind of a building or anything else in a park that is not connected with park work, whether it be for this aeronautical work or anything else. And while the Committee on Appropriations has under advisement, and I have the opportunity of expressing an opinion to members of the committee and also to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, at the same time I would like to make this little statement.

I have been interested in the aviation business from the start. In my judgment, the time will come, and very speedily, when flying machines will have control of war, and if they have battles in the future, in the main they will be in the air. I do not know whether anyone will want to go into battle or not. Now, if we create this aviation corps in the Army, which I am satisfied will be done, it seems to me that that corps, which started out with 60 officers, ought to be the corps that has control of the research and experimental work, so that they will have men who are in the field, who learn by actual experience, and who can bring that experience to bear on the research investigation work. If we did not have this corps in the Army, I would be in favor of letting the Smithsonian or some one else take charge of it; but it is perfectly manifest, as it seems to me, that the use of flying machines in war will in the main be by the Army rather than the Navy. The Navy could make some use of them, but in the main it will be by the Army, and the Army and the Navy both have been very successful in investigation and research work in connection with the arms which they use in time of war.

I have no doubt that this service can do that same thing. I think that as soon as it is organized we ought to give them some appropriations which they can use in experimental work, and not confine them, as I think under the existing appropriation probably they are practically confined, to the purchase of flying machines.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

On page 4, after line 19, insert the following:

"Medical and Hospital Department: For the purchase of medical and hospital supplies, including the same objects specified under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, $50,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this estimate came in after the committee had reported the bill, and the necessity for it is the same as for the other provisions for the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

BUREAU OF FISHERIES.

Alaska Service: For protecting the seal fisheries of Alaska, including the furnishing of food, fuel, clothing, and other necessities of life to the natives of the Pribilof Islands of Alaska, transportation of supplies to and from the islands, expenses of travel of agents and other employees and subsistence while on said islands, purchase, hire, maintenance of, and crews for vessels, and including not exceeding $2,500 for installation of water supply on St. Paul Island, and for all expenses necessary to carry out the provisions of the act approved April 21, 1910, entitled "An act to protect the seal fisheries of Alaska, and for other purposes," and for the protection of the fisheries of Alaska, including travel, hire of boats, employment of temporary labor, and all other necessary expenses, to continue available during the fiscal year 1915, $35,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

On page 5, line 12, strike out the sum "$35,000" and insert the sum "$50,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry about this item. I think it was a year ago when we tried on this side of the House to insert in the regular appropriation bill an item for taking care of these people, including employees, up on the Pribilof Islands. My recollection is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was very strenuous in his opposition to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. The item was reported.

Mr. MANN. And the result was that the men who were employed by the Government up there for years were discharged. It was stated at the time on the floor that that was one of the purposes—to discharge men who were up there and knew the business and then after a while to come in here with a deficiency appropriation for the purpose of hiring some men who did not know anything about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. They had four agents supposed to be working on this Alaskan business, and they had a very delightful arrangement by which two of them spent half their time in Washington and then would go up to Alaska, and the other two would come back from Alaska and spend half of their time here. The appropriation for this particular work is carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill. The supplies are sent up in the first week of June, and it has been customary to make enough of the appropriation available before the end of the fiscal year to enable the supplies to be purchased and the vessels to be chartered. It is very apparent that the sundry civil bill will not become a law before the 1st of June, and this sum is transferred out of the amount that would be carried in the sundry civil bill and placed herein.

Through a misunderstanding, the committee was under the impression that $35,000 was the amount required to charter the boat and furnish the supplies, but the chartering of the boat amounts to $9,000 and the supplies in the neighborhood of $40,000 or $41,000. The boat is held under option, and the supplies have been ordered, subject to the appropriation being made. But this is not the item which the gentleman from Illinois has in mind.

Mr. MANN. Is this to take the place of an item that otherwise would be in the sundry civil bill, or will the sundry civil bill carry an item also?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the part that is needed before the 1st of June.

Mr. MANN. How many Eskimos are there on these islands now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall. But I think there are several hundred on the Pribilof Islands.

Mr. MANN. What is the total cost of feeding them? Is it $100,000 a year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is $100,000 for the schools and other things.

Mr. MANN. They are at liberty to fish. They get all the fish they want, and they are at liberty to catch seals and take all the seals they want, and until we went up there that is all they lived on—fish and seals.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Civilization has gone in there, and they can not live on those things now.

Mr. MANN. I think a man would be very foolish to take the trouble to earn a living if he was furnished freely with all the things that he needed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They will not eat seal blubber if we furnish them with good food.

Mr. MANN. Why should a man incur the perils of the sea and go out in boats if the Government will furnish him, instead of fish, with roast beef, ham, coffee, tea, sugar, salt, and fruits of all kinds, canned and dried?

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think civilization ought to give them a little more than blubber to live on?

Mr. MANN. I am blubbering because we give them too much. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the gentleman any facts there about how many seals there are now on the Pribilof Islands? Some two years ago, I think it was, we stopped the killing of seals. As a matter of information I would like to know whether or not there has been much of an increase in the seal herds?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I did not inquire.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he has any figures as to how much we pay for the hire of boats up there in the fisheries? I notice that in this bill it says "hire of boats." I was wondering whether it would not be cheaper to own a boat.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is carried in the language of the appropriation for the current year. The amount carried in this item is to charter a boat to go up from Seattle to the Pribilof Islands. The statement has been made that an arrangement had been entered into to charter that boat for $9,000, and $41,000 is to buy the supplies.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I was wondering whether it would not be better to own a boat up there, which could be used at the same time for the protection of the fisheries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Secretary of Commerce has recommended that the limit of cost of the lighthouse tender, which was authorized at a cost of $250,000——

Mr. MANN. At $325,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Should be increased to $325,000, so that it would be a suitable vessel to carry the supplies to Alaska and also work at times when it is now claimed that a smaller boat could not work. Of course, unless Congress fixes the limit of cost of that vessel at $325,000 the Committee on Appropriations has no authority to appropriate in excess of the limit fixed. What the gentleman has in mind, however, probably is an estimate by the Department of Commerce for an appropriation of $100,000 to purchase 9 or 10 boats for use in Alaska.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is stated that in the inspection of the fish canneries in Alaska there is no means of going to them except by notifying the persons who operate them that the inspectors desire to go there and by having the canneries send a vessel to take the agents of the department to visit the cannery; it is claimed that the result is that the agents can never make a real inspection, because the people in charge of the canneries are always prepared for their visits when they arrive. That estimate is pending, but there is no authority for the purchase or construction of those vessels, and it is not submitted as an estimate for a deficiency.

Mr. LINTHICUM. This does not cover that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it has nothing at all to do with that. This is merely for the charter and the supplies that are to be sent up to feed these natives and the American employees in the Pribilof Islands.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I brought up the question because I was interested in the proper protection of the fish. I do not believe it can be done properly in the way things are now going on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the fish probably are properly protected, but perhaps the method in which they are put up for our use might be very greatly improved upon.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They are not properly protected when they turn some millions of herring into fertilizer up there. That is not proper protection, certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the vessel that is to take the supplies up there is chartered at a cost of $9,000, and the people who furnish the vessel also operate it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a charter party.

Mr. MANN. The suggestion has been made that we build a vessel which can be operated to go up there. I would be inclined to think that the cost of operation would amount to as much as the freight we pay, and perhaps more, when we charter a vessel going up to the Pribilof Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Heretofore the cost has been from $18,000 to $20,000 a year. For four years it has cost $80,000. The statement is made that this very favorable present rate is obtained because of a desire to send the vessel up a little earlier than usual, perhaps.

Mr. MANN. These other vessels that were referred to by the gentleman from New York in response to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]——

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are vessels to be stationed up in Alaska.

Mr. MANN. They would not be available to go up to the Pribilof Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the department have recommended that they have a new navy in the Department of Commerce. They have one now connected with the Lighthouse Service and another connected with the Coast and Geodetic Survey. They want an additional new navy now to skirt along the coast of Alaska in order to give very many pleasure trips, and undoubtedly useful trips, to inspectors employed in that department.

Mr. BARTLETT. They have not got that.

Mr. MANN. It would be very convenient to have one in Chicago in the summer time, though I have never favored it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would be more useful in New York.

Mr. MANN. I can not see any other use for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us have a vote.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Bureau of Naturalization: For the purchase of safety paper for certificates of naturalization, $4,200.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we are now considering an appropriation for one of the departments of the Government, I take this opportunity to ask the gentleman from New York what information he has relative to the reports which have been generally published of late in the newspapers to the effect that some of the departments are turning out many of the old Grand Army veterans. Too vigorous a protest can not be made against this reported action. I notice that the Post Office Department, for instance, has let out about 14, and demoted about 25 more, recently. Of course, they may advance some good reason for this, but many of the cases are indeed pathetic, and it seems to me we ought either in this Congress to enact some character of retirement legislation to provide for these dependent employees of the Government or else they should not in their declining years be thrown out upon the world, and contrary to section 4 of the act of August 23, 1912, which states:

Provided, That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments, no honorably discharged soldier whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary.

The commander of the Department of the Potomac, Dr. J. K. Gleeson, in a recent interview concerning these dismissals, said:

Many of these men present pathetic cases. With no prospect of a pension bill at this session they are literally thrown out, with little prospect of obtaining other work. Their age precludes that; but in the majority of cases their age does not impair their efficiency in the work they have been performing right along.

It also was found that the average age of those forced to resign was 73 years. Among these, one man who had served 37 years was 74 years old, another with 32 years of service was 70, an 81-year-old man had spent 24 years in the service, and two men, each 77 years of age, had been 20 and 15 years, respectively, in the post office. The youngest of the four men removed was 69 years, a second was 71, and the other two were 77.

With the demotions the Grand Army of the Republic has not a word of complaint—

Said Commander Gleeson—

But where we do draw the line is at the throwing out on the streets of men with families who have fought for their country, and who have spent their best years in her service. It is bad enough for a private concern to do that, but when a Government shows so little consideration for men who risked death, and who offered their lives to her, it is time for a protest.

It seems to me it is up to Congress to try to meet this very serious situation. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he knows anything of these dismissals.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information except what I read in the papers. Of course I always make allowances for anything I see and for a good many of the things I hear. I think the cases referred to by the gentleman are in the city post office, which is provided for out of the moneys carried in the Post Office appropriation bill and would not naturally come to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not in the Department of Labor, anyhow.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Has the gentleman any information, as one of the Democratic leaders of the House, as to whether anything is going to be done in the way of reporting legislation to provide a retirement plan to meet these cases?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's eyesight is failing. I am not one of the leaders of the House, and so I can not furnish the information.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. The gentleman is too modest. Certainly we all regard him as one of the leaders of his party.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not one of those who formulate programs. Like the gentleman from California, I am simply a private in the ranks, and there are things which I can not help.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEGISLATIVE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $52,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the gentleman from New York from his data give us the amount that we have appropriated for the contingent fund for the last two or three years?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the current year we appropriated $75,000 and a deficiency of $30,000, which makes $105,000.

Mr. MANN. For the current year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the current year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not included this item?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Plus this item of $52,000.

Mr. MANN. And then there will be another item in the general deficiency bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; this is expected to take us to the end of the year, unless the House authorizes some additional expenditure.

For 1913 the appropriation was $210,000, but there was an unexpended balance of $30,000 which was reappropriated, and is a part of the amount I have already stated for the current year. In 1912 the appropriations were $190,000; in 1911, $107,000; in 1910, $115,000; 1909, $115,000; 1908, $170,000.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any data which shows how much these expenditures have been for special committees and regular committees of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not that information at this time. When the previous urgent deficiency bill containing a reappropriation of $30,000 of the amount previously appropriated was before the House I had that information.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any data which shows how much the committees of the House in making investigations have cost in the way of printing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they would not get that before the committee, because all of that printing is paid for out of the congressional allotment.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but I thought perhaps that information had been secured from the Public Printer in connection with the congressional allotment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have not obtained the information.

Mr. MANN. I am told, although I do not vouch for the statement, that there has been some abuse in the way of printing by some of the committees of the House, which would, I think, attract attention if brought specifically before the House, which I have no desire to do. It is said that very large amounts of matter have been printed solely for the purpose of sending into certain districts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information as to that. These committees are authorized to have printing done. In the Committee on Appropriations the practice is, from the experience that has been had there, to have printed such a number of copies of the hearings on different bills as experience shows there will be a demand for. After a session or two passes there are usually no copies of hearings of the Committee on Appropriations other than the official files. At times, when some particular subject is investigated for which there will probably be a greater demand than usual, that committee prints separately the testimony taken on that particular subject, so that the additional copies of that testimony may be printed without going to the expense of printing a large volume. What the practice is with other committees I do not know, but I think by the exercise of care a considerable saving can be effcted and eliminate the cost of unnecessary copies of hearings. If the printing bill now before the two Houses becomes a law——

Mr. MANN. Which it will not.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). The hearings of all committees will become public documents, to be indexed and distributed, and there will not be very much saved in the cost of printing.

Mr. MANN. I said it would not become a law, but that does not mean that I am opposed to it. I say it will not become a law because the Democratic Members of the House have got the public business tied up so that no bill of any length will become a law, and not many without length will ever have a chance to become a law, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will try to find time to pass all legislation that is really essential for the prosperity and welfare of the people.

Mr. MANN. I understand that is the position of the leaders, and we shall say that where you did not pass legislation you did not consider it good for the prosperity and welfare of the people.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not speak for the leaders; I am speaking for the rank and file.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the gentleman is a leader; he is speaking for himself. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding speeches, to continue available during the fiscal year 1915, $6,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, after line 22, insert: "There is authorized to be expended out of appropriations made in joint resolution approved October 24, 1913, for furnishing the additional rooms in the House Office Building, $1,600 for additional awnings for windows in said building."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Out of the money appropriated to furnish the additional story, awnings have been purchased, but awnings on the balance of the building are in very bad shape. On an average they cost $4 apiece, and this is to provide awnings for the comfort and convenience of Members.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does this provide any fund for dividing and partitioning off the rooms opposite the offices on the fifth floor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it was estimated a few years ago that that would cost $84,000. This is for awnings for outside windows.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am referring to the dormer space opposite the offices on the fifth floor. That space has not been partitioned off.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that will be taken care of later.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means the wire partitions?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; that does not answer the purpose of Members. That space should be partitioned off so that it can be used by Members for typewriting and extra folding and addressing envelopes, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. That would not be practicable; it would be hotter than hades in the summer time, and I do not know but that in the wintertime.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It can only be used as a storage space. If the space were partitioned even roughly, so that it could be used for the purpose of Members who have extra help addressing envelopes and speeches, it would be convenient.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would be very inconvenient and very hot.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is there any proposition before the committee about dividing the offices so as to form a private office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A few years ago an estimate was made that it would cost $84,000 to divide the offices in the House Office Building.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wanted an office divided up, why did not he take an office on the fifth floor when he had the opportunity?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Because some like to be on the ground floor, and I am one of them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had an opportunity to take an office divided and he ought not to complain because they are not all alike.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman will realize that we have plenty of space, but we want it divided so as to get a private office.

Mr. MANN. Where does the gentleman mean there is plenty of space?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have a room that has plenty of floor space; but if it were divided up so that a man might do work on bills and such things as that, it would be a very great advantage. At present everybody is coming in and interrupting, and we do not have an opportunity to do the work unless we take the work home.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentlemen, it must be understood, who are on their feet have two or three offices each.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have only one room and an alcove, the door of which is never closed. A good many Members did not want these offices divided up the way they were, and an opportunity was offered for any former Member of the House to take one of the rooms that was divided up. We had to order some of the partitions out at the request of Members who were going to get rooms who did not wish those partitions.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I would rather stay in the office where I started. If I moved out, I might break my luck.

Mr. MANN. Wise man.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, it would be an economy of time and save much more than $84,000 to the Government if there were partitions put in those offices, so that a Member might have a private office where he could concentrate his mind on his work and not be distracted by the pounding on the typewriter and ringing of the telephone and other confusion of a general office, requiring him, whenever he wants to do any consecutive work, to take his books and papers home and work there until 11 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. MANN. A Member of Congress ought to work in the daytime, and then he ought to take his work home at night.

Mr. ALLEN. And, of course, we do.

Mr. MANN. I exhibit myself as a healthy specimen of the man who can do that.

Mr. ALLEN. But in the morning a Member should be in his office, so that those who call from his district will find him there and not have to be told that he is working at home, for lack of accommodations in the Office Building.

Mr. MANN. Members of Congress are in their offices too much. They ought to be more in the Chamber.

Mr. ALLEN. I said "in the morning."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, if we had more conveniences over there, they would not be here at all.

Mr. MANN. We ought to have sharp tacks on all of the chairs over there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I wish the chairman of the Appropriations Committee would state whether there is any provision in this item for the restoration of the desks of Members in the House Chamber?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; and there never will be if I can prevent it.

Mr. MANN. There would have been a point of order made upon it long ago if there had been any such provision.

Mr. MOORE. Having a minute or two, I would like to comment upon that subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is the only Member I have ever heard complain of the lack of desks in the Chamber.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MOORE. I have a large number of letters in my possession, which I will produce at the proper time, from Members of the House, saying that they are very much inconvenienced by the present arrangement, which is somewhat Anglomaniac. The House now is made to conform very much to the British custom, which I understand in some respects would be offensive to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], but nevertheless it apes the British Parliament, and it is not for the convenience of American Members of Congress.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] a moment ago said that if the offices were a little more convenient in the House Office Building it would be very difficult to get Members into this Chamber at all. I wish to say that very many Members of the House are of the opinion that because they can not do any work in the House Chamber it does not pay to remain here always to hear a very few gentlemen comment upon public business. There are no conveniences for the average Member in this House.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has a desk over there to himself, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], our very distinguished leader on this side, has a corner of a desk here, which he constantly uses. There are very few others who have any such facilities. They may go outside, but if they do they sometimes lose the opportunity to be heard or the chance to offer amendments which might greatly improve legislation that is brought in by committees. We have no copy of the rules and digest at our command in this House, unless we send for them and wait two or three minutes. We have no facilities for keeping papers together, and must carry them in our pockets. It is easy for the gentleman from New York, with his splendid grasp of public affairs, having an office right here at the corner of the House Chamber to which he may go at his convenience at any time and get anything he desires, but those of us who have to go over to the House Office Building from time to time to get papers pertaining to matters that come up suddenly find it very inconvenient. Sometimes we lose the opportunity of being checked up on a roll call when going for books or papers that may be necessary to sustain ourselves in disputes, possibly, with the gentleman from New York. I think the question of these conveniences will rise here before the gentleman from New York thinks it will. We ought to have the desks restored or lockers or writing arrangements of some kind, in order that copies of the rules of the House, the Congressional Directory, and other necessary reference books and papers may be kept at hand. The individual Members are entitled to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I am very sorry I can not proceed further, but I have brought the matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a question. Is it necessary to wait for this appropriation before we get awnings on the fifth floor of the House Office Building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. The money for the awnings on the fifth floor is provided.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Already provided?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I just wanted to say that I know from personal experience that there is great necessity for them, because of all the hot places that I have ever been in, that is the worst.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will inquire about it. My attention has only just been called to the fact. I supposed the awnings were there. I have just been informed that they were ordered, but have not yet been delivered. Of course, delays in deliveries happen.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They ought to be put up. While I am on my feet, being one of the Members who have one of these offices on the fifth floor, I would like to say there are reasons, notwithstanding the statement made by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], why some of those offices below ought to be divided, as was suggested. The reason is this: These offices upon the fifth floor are so infernally hot that it is going to be impossible to live in them, and all the statements that you have been hearing from different parties and from those who helped construct the building that these offices upon the fifth floor were going to be comfortable and were not going to be hotter than the other parts of the building is all a mistake, as any man will know if he walks into one of those offices to-day. There have been several days already when it was almost impossible for me to stay in my office——

Mr. GARDNER. How will it be in July?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would not want to use the only word that comes to my mind as describing the conditions which I think will exist in those offices in July.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will permit, will the gentleman tell me who is responsible for the present structure, this remarkable structure that is called the House Office Building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the most distinguished architects in the country—Mr. Carrere, of the firm of Carrere & Hastings.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think myself that building as an office building is an architectural monstrosity, and every time I walked into that building I felt ashamed that I was one of the Members who voted to appropriate the great sum to construct it. It is absolutely unfit for office purposes. One-third of the money expended in its construction would have given every man in this House a fine suite of offices.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would not call the exterior of the building an architectural monstrosity, but I was referring to the arrangement of the interior.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not responsible——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course the gentleman from New York is not responsible; I am not criticizing; I am merely seeking information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A commission was created which was under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Capitol, and Mr. Carrere, of the firm of Carrere & Hastings, since deceased, who was one of the most eminent architects in the country, was consulting architect. The building was constructed so as to fit in with the architectural features of the Capitol and Library. Now, as regards the criticism of the arrangement of the interior of the building——

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no arrangement in the interior of the building; just a lot of halls.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I had nothing to do with that. I was very glad to be furnished with an office when that building was constructed, after having served eight years without any facilities whatever. Perhaps those of us who then got offices were not so critical as to whether we had our offices just as we desired them or not. I was so thankful to be given an office and not be compelled to hunt all over town for our work and our employees.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield the gentleman the balance of my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there has been any consideration given to the question of selling the desks which were formerly in the House? I do not think there is any likelihood of them being put back; I am sure I would not vote to put them back.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is wholly in control either of the Clerk of the House or the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. They are stored away. At one time it was thought perhaps Members might not be satisfied and those desks might be restored, but my experience has been that this House has had better order in the transaction of its business since the desks were taken out than it could ever possibly have had when the desks were here, and that in the consideration of important legislation the Members have been much better satisfied with the arrangement and conduct of the discussion on those measures.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman I think this is a very much better arrangement. I had a talk with the superintendent, and he told me that the desks might be sold after they found out how this new arrangement worked, and I am frank to say I would like to secure the old desk which I occupied, and lots of the other Members would like to have their old desks. I was told they could be secured. Now, if they could be sold, it would be quite a revenue to the Government, instead of letting them stay in storage, occupying space and losing in value all the time. They are made of splendid wood, nice desks, and lots of Members would like to have them if they can be procured.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Maryland is slightly in error in reference to these old desks. Now, I possess one of those old desks and chairs, and put them away somewhere in the garret at home. At that time, having sat at that desk for one or more terms of Congress, and having a higher opinion of the responsibilities of Members of Congress then perhaps than I do now, I seized the opportunity to buy that desk and chair for, I think, the modest sum of $5, at which they were sold; but those were individual desks. I wish now I had the $5 instead of the desk. [Laughter.] But those were individual desks. The desks which were last in the House were not individual desks. While each Member had a desk to himself, they were not partitioned as between themselves, and it would not be possible to divide those desks up between Members without sawing in two a half an inch or so of board and putting a leg on it, because there is only one leg on the desk; and while some one-legged Members might get through very well, a desk will not stand up with one leg unless widely separated at the bottom and it comes in the center of the desk. I do not believe they are available.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman that I understood from the superintendent they could be separated, and that with little expense another leg could be put on.

Mr. MANN. We went over that matter with the superintendent a little while ago, and it is not feasible, in my judgment, notwithstanding what the superintendent has said to the gentleman. We discussed the matter with the superintendent in front of the desks.

Mr. GARNER. Evidently these desks ought to be disposed of, if they are not going to be brought back, at whatever price can be gotten for them.

Mr. MANN. Yes. Some gentlemen are now insisting that we ought to place the desks back in the House. I think those desks have been retained with the idea that possibly a portion of them might be put back in the House, or possibly they might be fixed up in some way so that Members could take them. Those desks can not be put back in the House, all of them, and there still remain room for the membership of the House. There is no way by which this House with its present-sized Chamber can furnish an individual desk to each Member of the House, and thus supply desks for all the membership of the present House. We have increased the number of Members by 35 or 40 since the desks went out, and there is not room in the the House for the desks. Now, you could supply a sort of desk to the House, and what I rose for was to say on the floor what I have said to many Members individually without it seeming to have an effect upon them at all—those Members who complain of lack of room in which to put papers—that in each of these four desks here now there are on the side toward the Speaker three drawers. Some of those drawers are kept locked and a portion of them are kept unlocked. Keys to the drawers which are locked are in the hands of the respective party men on the two sides of the House, and Members could get these drawers opened and put papers in them and have them locked while the House is not in session and get the papers when they come in again without any trouble. I think I have told that to a large number of gentlemen on my side of the House who complain of a lack of opportunity or any place in which to put their papers, and I am sure that not one of them has ever put a single paper in one of those drawers. So I have doubted whether there was that great lack of opportunity. Yet I do not know that people want to keep papers in them.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have put papers in them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Washington has put papers in the drawer to which I have the key and to which nobody else has a key, and I am always glad of the opportunity to do that, but if I were not here he could not get into the drawer.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I could put them into one of the other two.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. HAY) having resumed the chair, Mr. FERRIS, Chairman of th Committee of the Whole House on the state f the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16508) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same ' the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was agreed to was laid on the table.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order under the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, and for the consideration of other bills mentioned in the special order of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not see the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] here, but I know he intended to yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. How much time remains for debate on the two sides?

Mr. ADAMSON. Sixty-six minutes and fifty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the paramount national necessity is trust legislation that will at once reassure honest business and wipe out monopoly.

No blind, groping, random, timid attack upon the legal forms used by big business can either reassure honest business or destroy monopoly.

Only a clearly constructive, comprehensive, direct remedy, applied boldly, not to the form but to the substance of the evil, will reassure honest business and crush monopoly.

The pending bills, containing, it is true, many commendable features, are, taken in their entirety, blind and random and timid. With our 24 years of trust-law experimentation to judge by, there is a strong and harrowing prospect that they will merely thicken the legal fog in which honest business is lost and in which monopoly hides while it fattens.

The Progressive Party trust bills, which are direct and constructive, which do not confound big business and monopoly, and which do attack not the form but the substance of monopoly, which boldly recognize that there are monopolies that have grown from natural causes, as well as monopolies that have grown from unnatural and illegal practices, and which eliminate both kinds of monopolies, would give honest business full information as to just what it can and what it can not legally and properly do. And they would destroy monopoly.

The Democratic measures mean further delay in the solution of the trust problem. The Progressive measures mean dispatch.

The pending Democratic measures, save for a mere rudimentary and purely investigative trade commission, which is to go hunting in the trust jungles—with a camera—leave all the work to the lingering, laborious, inexpert adjustments of the overcrowded courts.

The Progressive plan creates a powerful trade commission, with the right to develop whether a monopoly exists, upon what basis it exists, and to take away its monopolistic power.

MONOPOLY'S PLAY FOR DELAY.

The millstone around the neck of the honest business of the Nation, waiting for solution, and offered now these random Democratic measures, is delay.

The crying necessity of the hour, the need of decent trade, the demand of honest competition, the rights of labor, the exigency of the people, is, in this matter of remedial legislation, expedition.

For delay is the darling device of our money overlords. They have gorged upon it for 40 years and grown fat. Upon this meat each day they have added to their insolence, their brutality, their insatiable hunger for more and irresponsible power. They have bribed, stolen, perjured, debauched for delay. They have, in cynical contempt for the law, in scorn of the public weal, plundered the public estate, fed upon the substance of labor, taxed the people, polluted the public service, by means of delay. They have tightened their control of various corporation practices; they have perverted the benefactions of the principle of cooperation; they have distorted the advantages of steam, electricity, and of invention; they have preyed upon human life itself—all by the simple instrumentality of delay. They have played the rights of the States against the Nation, the Nation against the State, the decree of the court against the edict of the legislature, the legislature against the court, for delay.

Their creed is the divine right of vested property, their quest possession and its superior rights in the law, and their weapon delay.

For half a century they have fenced with the common law, with statutory prohibition, with executive attack, with judicial definition, always for delay; the delay which is fastening on society the technical rights of ill-gotten property against the day of society's helplessness and despair.

That is why there can not be between this Government and private monopoly conciliation; that is why there must be war, remorseless and unrelenting and exterminating war, upon monopoly.

THE DEVASTATION OF COMMERCIAL BRIGANDAGE.

For here, at the end of a struggle lasting nearly a quarter of a century and after a drawn battle, we are to move once more on the enemy of the Republic. Every consideration calls for courage from Congress. Every factor involved is a challenge to our earnestness of purpose. The evil forces we face are, to all of us, matters of daily observation. There is no man here who can not point, in his own district, to the victims of the system. In every State, in every city, in almost every town there is evidence of its cruel brigandage—the crumbling ruins of abandoned mills, absorbed and closed by the trust; the tragedy of the little merchant struggling awhile against his monstrous enemy, to sink at last with the damning brand of commercial failure upon him; the great, sad, shifting, homeless army of unemployed, which is forever groping from the job that has disappeared out into the darkness of industrial uncertainty and despair.

There is no man here who is unaware that the great natural resources of the country, its timber, its coal, its phosphates, are concentrating into the hands of the few; that the commodities of daily universal use, its sugar, its oil, its food, its raiment, the material of its shelter, are gravitating to a narrower and narrower control.

There is no man here who does not impeach, in his moments of deeper deliberation, an economic spectacle which shows 5,000,000 farms, annually teeming with grain, swollen in volume an hundredfold by the beneficence of machinery, and side by side with these bursting bins of plenty hunger and want; which shows hundreds of thousands of pastures dotted with flocks and millions of acres white with cotton, and side by side with them the rags of penury; which shows the greatest developed and undeveloped coal measures of the earth, and side by side with them the city's poor, carrying the family fuel for a winter's day home in a bushel basket.

This is the condition which challenges the consideration of Congress. For this we begin again the battle against monopoly. We ought to attack with certainty, with definiteness, and with courage. We ought to mean business. It is a betrayal of the Democracy to enter this fight with a white flag convenient and equipped only with blank cartridges.

THE PATIENCE OF THE PEOPLE.

It is nearly 50 years since Vanderbilt epitomized the economic attitude of monopoly in the exclamation, "The public be damned!" The attitude of his class has never changed. It may have permanently omitted the early and vigorous expression of scornful condemnation from its vocabulary, but it has not changed its view or, as is shamelessly evidenced in the New Haven piracy, its practices.

The public, resenting the insult, has sought for 50 years to meet the challenge through this governmental agency and that. It has maintained through long and discouraging periods of official futility cheerful and impartial reliance upon State and national law; it has exercised marvelous patience while the executives, the legislatures, and the courts in turn attacked, in its behalf, and returned worsted from the fray; through good times and bad, through this policy and that, through seasons of golden partisan promise and pinchbeck performance the public has not repined.

Yet every defeat of the public has added to the infamy of the insult, every delay has increased the difficulty of the problem of monopoly, and every compromising postponement of adequate remedy has brought the disease nearer the stage of malignancy.

Fifty years ago the Nation had not differentiated between the transportation monopoly and the industrial monopoly. But 30 years ago the difference began to be apparent. In 1885 the oil and sugar monopolies were identifiable. Other industrial monopolies followed fast upon their heels. Under the lash of public apprehension Congress passed its prohibition against private industrial monopoly. Relief did not follow. There was after a waiting period an outcry against the inaction of the administration of the law. After another long period there was vigorous prosecution of the trusts. But the attitude of the monopolists did not change and mere prosecution, as it often is, was not in this instance a corrective. At last there came in a celebrated test case the decision of the court of last resort, upholding the act of Congress, confirming the contentions of the prosecution, and entering the imperial mandate of final authority—the judicial decree of dissolution of the Standard Oil Co. The decree proved impotent.

SHALL WE TRAVEL THE CIRCLE OVER AGAIN?

Most of us have in our lifetime seen the Standard Oil Co. operate as a pool, as a trust, and as a holding company, and under a community of interests, but always as a monopoly. We have seen every successive form of the company succumb before the governmental processes brought against it, and the substance of its monopoly remain inviolate and intact.

It has been a long, hard, disheartening circle for the people of the United States to travel, and they have ended where they started. Shall we ask them to travel the circle again, or shall we strike out in the new direction to which ripened experience, economic knowledge of the facts, and good judgment and public welfare points?

Shall we continue to attack monopoly as before with rigid legislative prohibitions, applied selectively and sporadically by the prosecution attorney, and enforced by the courts in decrees that are neither effectual upon the defendant at bar nor corrective of like malefactors not at bar?

Or shall we attack monopoly by placing in the hands of a strong administrative commission the business of directly determining (1) the existence of monopoly; (2) the basis of that monopoly; and (3) the manner of ending that monopolistic power?

Shall we continue, as proposed by the Democrats here, the policy of passing on to the courts for definition specific inhibitions directed against the forms of monopoly instead of its substance?

Or shall we adopt the policy proposed by the Progressive Party of giving to honest business free play for the highest degree of commercial and industrial efficiency and of putting a speedy end to dishonest business and to monopoly?

Shall we inaugurate a feeble investigative trade commission, as the Democratic leaders propose, and trust to the virtues of an optional publicity which an existing Bureau of Corporations has invoked for years in vain?

Or shall we have an interstate trade commission upon the progressive lines, armed not only to find facts but with power, when they have discovered facts, to act upon them?

It must be apparent that antecedent to an effectual application of an adequate solution of the problems of big and efficient business which is not monopoly and the elimination of big business which is monopoly is an interstate trade commission with administrative power.

THE COMMISSION POWERLESS—THE PROBLEM LEFT TO THE COURTS.

The Covington commission proposed by the Democratic leaders has no administrative powers. It is purely investigative. It will not enforce the prohibitions against combinations provided in the other Democratic measure, the Clayton bill.

The prohibitive provisions in the Clayton bill will be enforced only by the long, difficult, delaying processes of the courts.

The prohibitions of unfair trade practices in the Clayton bill intended to supplement existing law against unlawful restraints and monopolies, such as the prohibition of selling discrimination, are valuable; but they would be infinitely more valuable in the hands of a powerful commission than in the hands of the court. The same thing is true of the provision in the bill which makes it unlawful for the owner of a mine arbitrarily to refuse to sell the product of the mine to any applying purchaser. Again, the provisions of the Clayton bill which prohibits a tying contract between the manufacturer and the dealer wherein the dealer agrees not to patronize a competitor of the manufacturer would be more potential in the hands of a commission acting promptly than in the hands of the court, ill adapted to its very processes, for speedy action upon the various forms of infractions of this prohibition.

The soundness of this view is further emphasized by the provision in the Clayton bill against interlocking directorates. So far as the general prohibition against interlocking directorates in interstate railroad corporations and corporations engaged in selling railroad supplies and the prohibition against interlocking directorates in banks are concerned, they are meritorious, but they belong to other fields than that in which the problem of the industrial monopoly is involved. There is, however, a specific prohibition against interlocking directorates in industrial corporations which is worthy of special attention. This provision could be readily enforced by a commission. It is absolutely certain to be evaded and circumvented for long periods, highly profitable to malefactors, when its administration is left to the courts.

THE ATTEMPT TO ELIMINATE HOLDING COMPANIES.

The Clayton bill also attacks the form of monopoly, not its substance, in its attempt to eliminate "holding companies." When in time the courts reach with banning decrees this provision the offenders will change the form of monopoly and escape with the substance of monopoly as before.

In a word, the Clayton bill pursues the old, futile line of action. This course necessarily followed the creation of a weak investigative trade commission in the Covington bill. There are provisions in the Clayton bill which would be virile if administered by a commission. They will not be effectual in the courts.

There are other provisions in the Clayton bill, such as the provision of the individual's right to sue under the Sherman Act and the provision making a decree against a corporation admissible in other suits as conclusive evidence of the same facts and same questions of law which belong to the courts properly and the courts alone. But the measure as a whole, meritorious as many of its provisions are, is not part of a harmonious, effectual plan for the solution of the great industrial problems. It turns to that source from which prompt relief has not come and can not come—the courts; and it turns there with new problems which in delay, intricacy, and confusion may equal the old.

That it is not based on an analysis of the whole problem is best shown in its halfway, frightened tender to organized labor. Labor is not a commodity. It is the individual's power to work. It has asked and is entitled to exemption from the provisions of the Sherman law. Yet the Clayton measure, fearful of giving that, makes a milk-and-water offering to organized labor by providing that nothing in the antitrust laws shall be construed as forbidding labor organizations. It makes the same timid tender to associations of farmers, who in the highly individualized condition of agricultural production are not a menace to society and are not part of the problem of monopoly.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE THREE POLITICAL PARTIES.

The alternative proposals here are fairly representative of the political parties making them. The Democrats, grounded in an inherent conservatism which they seek to disguise by offering new legislation, are persisting in a pursuit of the old policy of leaving the problem to the courts. All the argument which points out incontrovertibly that the courts must continue to touch the problem only within the bounds of settlement possible in private litigation is passed by without answer. All the mountain of evidence that in the business world there are a thousand delicate problems, each of which presents a different and distinct difficulty which a chance suit in court can not reach of necessity, is ignored. The Democrats believe that the old way is the best way.

And that is the position of the Republican leadership, with this difference, that the Republican leadership would do nothing in the way of tender of additional legislation in aid of the courts. They believe that the old way is not only the best way, but that it should not be disturbed. They stand for the solution of the problem in the court and without supplementing the Sherman law with new definitions. Their position is frankly avowed in the minority views from the Committee on the Judiciary signed by three Republican Representatives, GEORGE S. GRAHAM, HENRY G. DANFORTH, and L. C. DYER. They say:

> The antitrust laws on the statute book at this time have been carefully considered by the Supreme Court and judicially interpreted through a period of 24 years, and if properly enforced are believed by us to strip corporations and trusts of any power to injure or oppress.
> No possible good can come from constant interference with business. It is our belief that business should have a rest from further legislation and be given an opportunity to adjust itself to the environment created by the existing antitrust laws as the same have been interpreted and are now being administered.
> The proposed legislation contains many new phrases and sets up new standards, all of which would require a period of years of interpretation by the courts before their full meaning can be definitely known by the business world.
> It is very undesirable to bring about such a period of uncertainty and doubt to worry and harass the business of the country.

A DIVISION AMONG THE REPUBLICANS.

This is the view of the conservative Republican leadership, set forth with the complete courage of the reactionary. It is interesting to note that this view meets at once a challenge from that portion of the Republican Party which, while in complete political alliance with the conservative leadership of the party, can not bring itself into harmonious relation with the same leadership on policies—a situation which has caused Republican ineffectuality through compromise when the party was in power, and will continue to increase its impotency as a minority when out of power.

For Representatives JOHN M. NELSON and A. J. VOLSTEAD, Republicans, do not join Representatives GRAHAM, DANFORTH, and DYER in their views. They file a separate dissent. The Sherman law is not all-sufficient to Representatives NELSON and VOLSTEAD, for they say:

In seeking a solution of the trust problem no matter is more vitally important than that of providing means for the more vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws. The Sherman Act has been upon the statute books for almost a quarter of a century; but the trusts have been constantly increasing both in number and in power. The fault has not been that the prohibitions of the Sherman law have not been broad enough, but that this act has not been vigorously enforced. A large number of most excellent proposals to strengthen the Sherman law so as to make it practically self-enforcing were presented to the Committee on the Judiciary. Most of these proposals have been ignored. This bill will not permit States or independents to intervene in dissolution suits against trusts to protect their rights. Nothing is done to hasten the disposition of antitrust cases in courts. Even the suggestion that the Federal courts should be prohibited from enforcing contracts involving violations of the antitrust laws was rejected.

In keeping with the characteristic division among Republicans, Representative MORGAN, Republican, of Oklahoma, reported another dissenting view. Among other things, he says:

It has been nearly 24 years since the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law Its meaning was long in doubt and obscurity. It is now better understood. The business world knows, in a way at least, its meaning. The law was not a success in preventing the concentration of business into large industrial units. We have large business organizations to-day, and there is no indication that through the enforcement of the Sherman law, or the enactment and enforcement of any new laws, our industrial units are to be materially lessened. The Sherman law has failed through the absence of proper administrative machinery to enforce its provisions. It is folly to enact more laws, when existing laws are not effective for lack of adequate enforcing agencies. What the country needs now is a law that will define and promulgate a well-defined national policy toward the great business interests of the country which will be just to our industrial forces and which will be fair to the people and fully protect them from exactions of business concerns possessed of monopolistic power.

THE PLAN PROPOSED BY THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The Progressive proposal on the problem is comprehensive and constructive. It is set forth clearly by Theodore Roosevelt. He says:

The true way of dealing with monopoly is to prevent it by administrative action before it grows so powerful that even when the courts condemn it they shrink from destroying it. The Supreme Court, in the Tobacco and Standard Oil cases, for instance, used very vigorous language in condemning these trusts, but the net result of the decision was of positive advantage to the wrongdoers, and this has tended to bring the whole body of our law into disrepute in quarters where it is of the very highest importance that the law be held in respect and even in reverence My effort was to secure the creation of a Federal commission which should neither excuse nor tolerate monopoly, but prevent it when possible and uproot it when discovered, and which should in addition effectively control and regulate all big combinations and should give honest business certainty as to what the law was and security as long as the law was obeyed. Such a commission would furnish a steady expert control, a control adapted to the problem, and dissolution is neither control nor regulation, but is purely negative, and negative remedies are of little permanent avail. Such a commission would have complete power to examine into every big corporation engaged or proposing to engage in business between the States. It would have the power to discriminate sharply between the corporations that are doing well and those that are doing ill, and the distinction between those who do well and those who do ill would be defined in terms so clear and unmistakable that no one could misapprehend them. Where a company is found seeking its profits through serving the community by stimulating production, lowering prices, or improving service, while scrupulously respecting the rights of others (including its rivals, its employees, its customers, and the general public) and strictly obeying the law, then no matter how large its capital or how great the volume of its business it would be encouraged to still more abundant production or better service by the fullest protection that the Government could afford it. On the other hand, if a corporation were found seeking profit through injury or oppression of the community by restricting production through trick or device, by plot or conspiracy, against competitors, or by oppression of wage-workers and then extorting high prices for the commodity it had made artificially scarce, it would be prevented from organizing if its nefarious purpose could be discovered in time or pursued and suppressed by all the power of the Government wherever found in actual operation. Such a commission, with the power I advocate, would put a stop to abuses of big corporations and small corporations alike. It would draw the line on conduct and not on size. It would destroy monopoly and make the biggest business man in the country conform squarely to the principles laid down by the American people, while at the same time giving fair play to the little man and certainty of knowledge as to what was wrong and what was right both to big man and little man.

Here, then, are three proposals—the Democratic proposal to continue in the old way by adding broad prohibitions to the law and waiting on the refining definitions of the courts; the Republican proposal to stand pat on existing law and to stand still; and the Progressive proposal to reach the problem constructively, intimately, and expeditiously.

That the delay involved in the program of both Republicans and Democrats is indefensible must be clear to the people of this Nation when they review the experience with monopoly in the last 25 years.

HISTORY OF GOVERNMENTAL ATTACK ON MONOPOLY.

For we have seen the three branches of the Government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—each in its turn register a confession of helplessness. Each has written a record of futility. And all, in their independent spheres, have contributed to a delay in solution which at times seems to deny the power of the Government itself.

First in attack upon the problem came the legislative forces. The problem presented itself originally in the form of the corporation. The corporation was impersonal, immortal, divisible in interest, limited in liability. It fattened instantly upon the advantages of the telegraph and the railroad which unified the Nation into a single market. Its menace, before the Nation, was the presentment of a single possibility—monopoly. The first assault was therefore upon the attempt to monopolize. There were many instances of the menace of monopoly, but popular imagination chose as the best example the Standard Oil Co., and popular sentiment made its attack, through its most readily available instrument, the Congress, with the Standard Oil in mind. Congress, with no restraint whatsoever, upon a rigorous determination, passed the Sherman antitrust law. It halted at no degree of general drasticity. A combination in restraint of trade and an attempt to monopolize were manhandled with a breadth of definition and an extremity of penalty that left to the offender apparently no avenue of escape. So Congress, responsive to public sentiment, passed the law of 1890 and washed its hands of the whole affair, and, having done in extreme measure all it could see to do, passed the matter over to the executive branch of the Government.

The executive branch of the Government, whatever its initial impulses, at once evinced, not an enthusiasm for the new law, but a reluctance to apply it. The latitude of discretion inherent in the initiative functions of a prosecuting officer, and notable to a degree in the Attorneys General of the United States, touched the law officers of the United States with grave hesitation. It was one thing for Congress to write broad inhibitions. It was quite another thing for the Attorney General to enforce them. If two men combined in restraint of trade, were they alike guilty with a hundred men who had so combined? And what was monopoly? Was it complete control of an industry or a substantial control? And was a single individual, possessed of all the elements of control in a given line, amenable to the law? During all the weary years of alternating periods of dubious inactivity and sporadic activity the law officers of the Government have been sadly mulled over these questions and are still uncertain. And when they have shown activity the other branch of the Government, the judiciary, has added confusing elements of its own to the problem that have further befuddled those who are expected to maintain the majesty of the law by its strict and impartial enforcement.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE COURTS.

For the judicial branch of the Government has a noteworthy part in this history. In due course of time the business of giving final interpretation to the law reached the Supreme Court. A long period of interpretation has followed. The court, jealous as it is of its precedents, has ruled two and opposite ways on the law and has seen one of its chief mandates prove futile—that dissolving the Standard Oil—just as in another case the law officers of the Government discovered that the jury system did not reach, in the Beef Trust prosecutions in Chicago. Among the first cases to reach the Supreme Court were those involving the question whether the interstate carriers were subject to the law. The courts held that they came under the law, although they continue to combine and are in a vast number of instances monopolistic in theory and, except for the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, are monopolistic in fact, and present a problem separate and distinct from industrial combinations and monopolies. The Supreme Court also held early in 1895, in the Knight case, that industrial establishments could combine when the combination only related to manufacture and not to commerce among the States or with foreign nations. The American Sugar Refining Co. purchased with its stock the stock of four independent refineries in Philadelphia which had been competitors, and, to quote the court, "had acquired nearly complete control of the manufacture of refined sugar in the United States." Yet the court found that this was not such a combination as could be reached by the Sherman antitrust law. Following these decisions there were unsuccessful attempts in Congress to amend the old Sherman antitrust law to meet this seeming deficiency in the measure discovered by the Supreme Court. And during the years Congress has indulged in various investigations and created a Bureau of Corporations, in this instance as always demonstrating to itself and to the country the growing power of the big concerns, but always without bringing itself nearer a remedy. And in the course of time Congress has seen the Supreme Court change its attitude. Where the court had once ruled that articles of manufacture were not subject to the law—the Knight case—it now has ruled that articles of manufacture intended for interstate commerce are covered by the law—the Standard Oil case and the American Tobacco Co., 1911.

The Supreme Court completed the first cycle of the trust era with its decision in the Standard Oil case, which was given at the same time with that of a scarcely less notable case—the American Tobacco Co. case. Not the least of the values of the Standard Oil case is the universal knowledge of it by the people.

THE LONG FIGHT WITH STANDARD OIL.

The Standard Oil Co. was one of the first concerns to demonstrate to the people the potentialities wrapped up in the corporate form. It was powerful, closely knit, dominated by a single individuality, unconscionable, often venal, politically and corruptly busy, and it dealt in a commodity of general use. It invited early popular attack and it fought back. It proved early to all who are just ordinarily observant that publicity is not invariably a cure for the disease the Nation is fighting against. The Standard Oil was exposed in a hundred ways and upon a hundred occasions, but it continued to grow in size and strength. All that witnesses in the lower courts had brought against it, all that the writers of industrial history and of current politics had laid at its doors in infamy, lawlessness, and corruption, the Bureau of Corporations, in an exhaustive research, confirmed. But there was no cessation to the steady growth of power in this concern. Congress passed other laws, in other fields, believed to be to the detriment of the great Oil Trust. The giving of rebates to shippers by railroads, a device which the Standard Oil had used flagrantly, was prohibited. The Standard Oil moved along complacently. Congress removed the protective duties on petroleum and its products. The Standard Oil was unruffled. And finally the Supreme Court reached the case which had been brought against it. A Nation stood for months expectant, watched and waited each decision day. Markets halted in anxiety. The whole industrial future of the country seemed to pivot upon the decree of the court. And the court—20 years after the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law—found against the Standard Oil Co., and in solemn mandate ordered it dissolved. It was believed by some, before the decision, that the decree would rock to its foundations the business fabric of the Nation. But the great majority of the people believed nothing of the sort. There had grown up through the years of weary waiting an incredulity among the people about the possibility of forcing disintegration upon so great a concern. No panic followed. And the Standard Oil did not dissolve. It followed a form of dissolution by a fractional division of stock, but continued in potentiality, in profit, in service, in product, the same dominating, domineering unit it had always been. The market values of its several segregations, all in complete harmony, have from time to time leaped upward. The cost to the consumers of its products has advanced, and to-day the dissolution of the Standard Oil is not visible to the naked eye of lawyer or layman.

WHAT FOLLOWED THE DECREE OF DISSOLUTION.

Indeed, the decree strengthened the monopoly. Herbert Knox Smith, formerly Commissioner of Corporations, gives interesting testimony of this. Before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce he said recently, speaking of the suit for dissolution and its results:

> Before we started the suit there was simply the great holding company, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, which held the capital stock of the subsidiaries. The corporation was by that decree dissolved into those subsidiaries, 34 in number. The stock of the new subsidiaries was then issued to the holders of the old Standard Oil stock in place of the old stock of the Standard Oil Co. For instance, if you held one share of stock in the Standard Oil Co., the old company, you would now get a fractional share of stock in each of the 34 companies—the Acme Oil Co.; the Vacuum Oil Co.; the National Transit Co., which was a pipe line; the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, of Tennessee, of Kentucky, of New Jersey, of New York, and of California—lots of companies that no one outside of the trade had ever heard of and that a great many in the trade never heard of. Take the position of the stockholder who had held one share in the old Standard. It is worth noticing. I do not exaggerate these figures. I can not state them exactly, but I will give the essence of them. Instead of having his one original share of the stock of the Standard Oil Co., he now got a new certificate that he held in, say for instance, the Acme Oil Co., $\frac{25}{100}$ of one share of the stock of the Acme Oil Co. Well, you can imagine his emotions; six figures in the enumerator and denominator. He at once said to himself, "This is beyond me; I will sell it." So he went to his broker, and his broker said he would sell it for him. But the broker also said, "I do not know what the Acme Oil Co. is worth, and you do not know, and there is only one little crowd of men in this country that does know." "Nevertheless, sell it," says the owner. So the broker sold. Now, these stocks fluctuated wildly on the market for the few months after the dissolution—I am not sure as to those figures, but my impression is that one of those companies fluctuated a thousand points on a par value of $100. No one, except a very few, knew the real values. But there was just one crowd of men who knew exactly what those companies were worth—of course, the inside men of the Standard Oil Co., such men as the Flaglers, the Rockefellers, and the rest of that little group that has always controlled the Standard. And naturally they cashed in that knowledge just at that point, just as anybody else would. They knew what the Acme Oil Co. was worth, for instance, what it paid, and what its assets were and its earning power. They knew exactly, because they were the directors of this corporation and of all the others. So they bought up the wheat and sold the chaff, and the result of that dissolution, under the Supreme Court decree, really was that in about six months the control of the real essence of the Standard Oil Co. was more closely concentrated in the same group of men than it was before the decree was issued. That was one curious result of the dissolution, through a court, which could not take any cognizance of the real economic business questions involved. The court simply dissolved it along the lines of its legal form, with no reference to its business relationships.

That is, the force of the legislative, the executive, and the judicial branches of the Republic were brought against the Standard Oil monopoly and it prospered mightily against all of them.

THE AGE OF COOPERATION AND COMBINATION.

And while it prospered a thousand other concerns, not selected for prosecution, unnoted by the general public, forwarded by the commercially ambitious and the speculative, or by others in self-defense, have formed into great corporations which are taking or are attempting to take the elements of competition from their particular lines of commerce and industry. We are in a very orgy of organization. The age of cooperation, the corporate form of doing business, the concentration of control in the individual through the telegraph and telephone, the opportunity for speedy delivery through quickened transportation facilities, the psychology of common current news and tastes and fashion, all predispose the Nation to that activity. And the inevitable result has been the large unit—has been "big business."

Against this tendency and the savage advantage many of the captains of industry have taken of it, the law of a people whose every impulse is toward the splendors of cooperation has as yet proved futile.

The people have been marvelously patient. They have resolved not to lose any of the advantages of cooperation, and they have suffered themselves to be the victims of combination because they expected the processes of government to differentiate between the beneficent forces of cooperation and the deadly forces of monopolistic combination. They have waited in vain.

The people are tired of waiting. They want results. They are weary of delay. They want action. They are sick of palliatives. They want remedy.

They are not afraid of coordination of effort. They do not fear magnitude. They do not decree that big business shall cease to be big. But they do decree that big business shall cease to be crooked. And they do demand that private monopoly, whether it result from causes which are natural and not crooked or from unnatural causes and crooked practices, shall be wiped out in this Nation. [Applause.]

The decree against private monopoly which the people registered in the Sherman antitrust law stands. It will continue to stand. No political party dares to lay the violating hand of repeal upon it. But there must be other legislation.

The various bills which have been introduced here are to supplement it by clarifying its terms and by facilitating its administration. These proposals are meritorious in the degree in which they do this.

HELPLESSNESS OF DEALING WITH FORM, NOT SUBSTANCE.

They can not clarify its terms, they can not facilitate its administration, unless they deal with the substance of the evil rather than its form. They can not clarify its terms by merely prohibiting not fundamentally the evil principle in the thing done, but the method by which it is currently done. They can clarify it by stating the underlying principle which makes the thing wrong. They can not facilitate its administration by merely empowering a commission to investigate.

They can facilitate its administration by giving a commission power to compel testimony and to act, in correction of the developed evils, upon that testimony.

It is this line which distinguishes the legislation proposed here by the Democratic Party and that which is offered by the Progressive Party. The Democratic measures—the interstate trade commission bill and the antitrust measure reported from the Judiciary Committee—attack the form of the evil. The Progressive proposals in the bills numbered 9299, 9300, and 9301, which I introduced November 17 last, attack its substance. I have said before, and I now reiterate, the Democratic measures will open up another long, weary, profitless cycle of uncertainty. The bills I introduced if enacted into law would bring speedy relief and remedy. They would drive private monopoly from the land and make dissolution of monopolies real and permanent. And they will give legitimate business the chart to which it is entitled—the chart which measures that deal with form and not substance will not and can not give.

That the Democratic Party's proposal for the creation of a trade commission, with its timid tender of powers of investigation, will bring no substantial relief is apparent from our experience with the Bureau of Corporations for a decade. This bureau has investigated, in many cases exhaustively. Its reports on petroleum, while corrective of certain practices, were conclusive of nothing materially remedial, nor were its reports on the beef industry nor on other lines, although they were thorough and valuable. They acquainted the Nation with facts, astounding and deplorable facts. But they remedied nothing. The Democratic trade commission, clothed with limited powers to develop facts, will find itself helpless, and, while the public waits, will inevitably appear at the doors of Congress, as the Interstate Commerce Commission previously appeared here for years, praying Congress to breathe the breath of life into its nostrils. Why not vitalize the trade commission at birth? Why not give it power to receive complaints, to act upon specific complaint, to deduce facts on concrete matters in controversy, to make findings, and to enforce remedies?

Why should the people, who have waited patiently for nearly a quarter of a century; why should legitimate business, which has held back in respe t for the law while the industrial pirates, with no fear of the law, have played with a free and high hand; why should the people and legitimate business be asked to wait another score of years of delay, every hour of which the great and powerful illegitimate interests are using to further entrench themselves and to enrich themselves out of the helpless public and against the common weal?

COVINGTON COMMISSION NOT LIKE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The Covington trade commission is not modeled after the Interstate Commerce Commission, as a considerable portion of Congress believes. It is merely an enlarged Bureau of Corporations. It collates facts. It may or may not make its findings public; but whether its findings are made public or not, it can not act on its findings. It may find evil practice and recommend correcting readjustments, but it can not compel correction. It may investigate whether a decree of dissolution entered against a corporation has been or is being carried out, but it must halt thereafter with a mere report of what it found. So far as its actual power is concerned, the trade commission proposed by the Democratic committee—the Covington bill—is as helpless as an astronomer viewing Mars through a telescope is over the affairs of that planet. There is one line in the bill which constitutes a flickering spark of life to the commission. It shall make annually a report to Congress. It will not be long until that report will bear a piteous confession of helplessness and a plaintive appeal for power.

How far a cry is this commission from the pressing need of the hour—a strong Federal administrative commission with power to maintain permanent, active supervision over industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce; a commission to stand guard over the public interest against the depredations of the enormous, secret, irresponsible industrial powers which infest the land; a commission with power to determine whether a monopoly in a given line exists and what is the basis of its monopoly, and the right to initiate action for its dissolution and power to see that the dissolution is carried out. This is the popular expectation of an interstate trade commission. In the Democratic measure offered here the public is doomed to bitter disappointment.

CATALOGUING REASONABLE AND UNREASONABLE RESTRAINTS.

That is, there are at the present moment two roads open to the Nation in meeting the trust problem. One offers the old method of leaving to the overcrowded courts, unfitted for the business of administrative adjustments and bound by rigid statutory definitions of commercial rights and wrongs, the vast task of establishing rules of conduct for the larger business of the country by occasional decisions in particular cases which present questions not necessarily and very infrequently applicable to others. This inevitably will lead to a recurrence of our former experience. We will again travel in the hopeless circle. The courts, adjudicating particular cases under inflexible statutes, will forbid the form, and the Nation will helplessly witness the prohibited form pass away and the substance of the evil continue. As the courts fix definitions and apply prohibitions, the offending culprits will change the form of their offense and continue their wrongdoing. The pool, the earliest form of combination, was prohibited by the courts under the Sherman antitrust law. The pool was dropped, and the trust was adopted. When the trust in its turn was placed under the ban, the trust was thrown overboard and the holding company devised; and as the day draws near when the holding company, under express provision of the law, must go, as this Democratic measure now before us ordains, the merger, the unification of the properties, will follow. And yet the evil of the pool, the trust, the holding company, and the merger are the same. The vice of this process is that each of the definitions, touching not the thing done but the manner in which it is done, is fixed only after years of litigation, and the public welfare suffers through the one element which seems certain—delay—the element most desired by the offending corporations and the most dreaded by its victims. Among the victims has been and is legitimate business, which has a right to demand freedom from confusion and uncertainty and annoyance. This freedom can not come from court processes. This has been clearly demonstrated by our experience with the interpretations of the Sherman antitrust law as rules of business conduct. The plain prohibition in the Sherman law, unmodified by the Supreme Court's interpretation, which prohibited every contract and combination in the form of trust or otherwise in restraint of trade as illegal, was not workable. It was within the experience of nearly every business man in the country that all combinations were not in restraint of trade. Tens of thousands of combinations in the ordinary run of business, forced by excessive and destructive competition, stood as proof, known of all men, that combination was not necessarily to the hurt of society, as tens of thousands of combinations demonstrated in increased efficiency, beneficial service to society. But the iron, unyielding letter of the law stood for 20 years in contradiction of universal practice, for the prevalent economic business necessity which compelled or induced partnerships and corporations overslaughed statutory ban. The great bulk of the business of the country, so far as the statute was concerned, was in a condition of open and more or less complacent outlawry. In the Oil and Tobacco cases the Supreme Court ended that era by reading a word into the statutes and deciding that only those contracts and combinations which were in "unreasonable" restraint of trade were illegal.

If legitimate business is now to wait for Congress to catalogue all that is reasonable or unreasonable restraint and for the courts to apply the definitions to all the new forms of combinations which business can and will invent, this device remaining as the one recourse for relief will be a sorry remedy for the chief problem of the Nation.

WHAT AN EXPERT TRADE COMMISSION COULD DO.

But if Congress will provide a strong administrative commission, armed with affirmative power, to meet the problems firsthand, without delay, within limits defined by Congress, and subject always to judicial review, there will come relief, certainty, and business freedom. This is the other road, the new road, offered to the Nation in the trust problem. It is not offered by the present halfway, hesitant Democratic measures now before us. It is offered in the Progressive measures which provide, in brief, for an interstate trade commission with, first, power to adduce facts; second, power to prevent unfair trade practices; third, power to destroy private monopoly.

Two general economic propositions are involved in this program—first, that full opportunity for natural competition must be preserved and small business must be protected from unfair trade practices, but that the arbitrary attempt to force an unnatural competition by law in the face of economic development will inevitably fail to benefit the community; second, that natural combination should be permitted, but that such combination must not be permitted to be a means to accomplish monopolistic control. That is, the Progressive proposition would give voluntary competition free play, but it would not artificially stimulate it at the expense of the community; would utilize the advantages of combination when it brought, through efficiency, benefit to society, but would halt and destroy it when it reached beyond the point of efficiency into monopolistic exploitation.

We would avail ourselves of the highest degree of commercial and industrial efficiency and end private monopoly.

The interstate trade commission proposed by the Progressives would be an expert body of men trained in the complexities of business, with plenary power to get at the facts. The commission, having investigated a corporation and having found it guilty of unfair trade practices, which are enumerated, and which consist of the advantage of discriminative transportation rates, rebates, discrimination in selling prices between localities and individuals, obtaining competitors' secrets by bribery, making oppressive exclusive contracts for the sale of articles over which the seller has a substantial monopoly, maintaining agencies held out as independent, the use of interlocking directorates to destroy competition, could summon the offending corporations to appear before it and show cause why an order should not be issued by the commission restraining the concern from engaging in a designated form of unfair competition. If a corporation refused to obey such an order, the commission would invoke the aid of the United States court, and the court would enforce the orders of the commission. In event a corporation exercised substantially monopolistic power, and was not subject to the obligation of public service, and its monopoly did not rest upon unfair trade practices, but in control of the supply of raw material, or in transportation facilities, or in control of finances, or in any other conditions inherent in the character of the industry, including patent rights, then the Progressive interstate trade commission would issue an order to the corporation, specifying such changes in the concern as would promptly terminate that monopolistic power. In case such a corporation refused to comply, the commission could apply to the United States courts for the appointment of a supervisor, with powers of a receiver, to conduct the affairs of the offending corporation and enforce upon it the orders of the commission.

The Progressives' proposition divides the powerful dominating business organizations subject to correction into two classes—those which prosper through unfair practices and those whose control rests on natural causes. It provides correction and the end of monopolistic control for the one class, elimination for the other. The monopoly which holds control through wrongdoing shall be held to account for its sins, and shall cease those practices which give it control. The monopoly which has dominion, not through wrongdoing, but from control per se and from inherent conditions, must surrender that feature of organization, management, and conduct which gives it dominion.

THE NATURE OF MONOPOLIES.

This brings us to a consideration of monopoly; for, at bottom, the whole problem is that of monopoly. The people at the start sensed this.

Dean William Draper Lewis, of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, now the Progressive candidate for governor in Pennsylvania, who has brought his great powers of analysis and his deep learning to this subject, says:

> Combination does not necessarily result in monopoly. Those who combine, even if they do so with the intent to exclude competition, to be successful must have a basis on which to rest their power other than their wealth or size, although it is true that a trust or monopoly always involves a combination, express or implied. It was, therefore, natural that the framers of the Sherman Antitrust Act believed that the dissolution of the trust would destroy the monopolistic power of those who controlled it. But our experience with that act indicates that all that is accomplished is the destruction of the existing form of combination. As those who have combined under the particular form of combination destroyed still collectively possess monopolistic power, they naturally recombine in a different form to reap the benefit of that power. Instead, therefore, of being directed toward the dissolution of the particular form of organization, legislation should be directed primarily to the removal of the basis on which the monopolistic power of the combination rests. Where this is discovered and removed, all motive for further combination with intent to monopolize ceases. Of course, where the particular form of combination is an essential element of the monopolistic power it should be dissolved.

The great majority of those people in the United States who concern themselves with political economy are flat-footedly against private industrial monopoly and against public industrial monopoly. And this downright antagonism does not deny that there has been in progress a great popular evolutionary broadening understanding of the matter. The American people have been given many definitions of monopoly, but they have not been led far afield from their first conceptions of the matter, and they hold it to-day. They have not confused form and substance. Monopoly is the power to determine price policy. The public has held to this definition tenaciously through every sort and degree of confusion. The pool, if it determined price policy—and it did—was a monopoly. The public so believed, and the public was right. The certificate-issuing "trust," which succeeded the pool, if it fixed price policy—and it did—was a monopoly. So was the community of interest. So was the holding company, which came next, and so is the complete merger. The chameleon changes in form did not alter the fact so far as the public is concerned.

The people have been frequently regaled with the solacing theory that this or that great corporation was held in leash by the competition of a considerable number of independents in the same line. But if the price policy of the independents was determined by the great corporation, no matter what the share of the trade it controlled, the public held it a monopoly. It was because of this tenacious popular capacity for adhering to fundamentals that the former proposition of the Democratic Party to fix upon a control of over 50 per cent of a given product to be proof of monopoly was rejected and has passed away as a measure of economic remedy. A corporation may control but 30 or 40 per cent of a given product, yet if it fixes the price policy it will be a monopoly. A corporation may control an inappreciable amount of the finished product, or none at all, but if it controls the supply of an essential raw material, or the machinery essential to production so that it fixes price policy in the trade of the product, it is a monopoly.

PUBLIC DOES NOT CONFUSE MONOPOLY AND MAGNITUDE.

The public has never and is not now confusing monopoly and magnitude. But the public has been and is now primarily concerned with the practice of those corporations of magnitude which achieve monopoly. And in this distinction there has been a tremendous progress in the minds of those people in the country who arrive at conclusions independent of the limitations of court decisions or congressional debates. For most men who follow the current of economic problems have come to acknowledge that monopoly may be attained in two general ways:

First. By unfair trade practices.

Second. By possession of natural bases of control.

Through one or the other of these two instrumentalities monopolies are maintained. Whatever the device of unification of interests, whatever the form of combination, precedent to monopoly, the fact of monopoly inheres in one of these two elements. And the method of attack on the one kind of monopoly can not be used successfully as the method of attack on the other. The Progressive bills draw the line between the two, equally condemn both, but provide different methods of attack. The corporation which has created a monopoly through selling discrimination, the acceptance of rebates, and the other known or yet to be defined unfair practices, is ordered by the Progressive trade commission to desist from the condemned practices; if it refuse, the power of the court to compel it to desist is invoked. Few would resist the orders of a commission with plenary power. The corporation which has created a monopoly through its possession of natural bases of production, the supply of raw material, patent rights, control of finances, or any element against public policy is ordered, after investigation, by the Progressive trade commission to divorce from itself those elements which create the monopoly. If the corporation refuses to comply, the commission may apply to the courts to appoint a supervisor, who shall take charge of the concern and carry into effect the orders of the commission.

These clear definitions and adequate remedies are not automatic. They must have behind them power of initiation and enforcement. This power can be found only in a strong administrative trade commission. A purely investigative commission will grope and flounder. Hope of relief will therefore remain in the courts, unequipped for the business in hand. Relief will not come, and the day of remedy will again be thrown into the far future and its difficulties increased.

The purely investigative commission propcsed here, as in the Covington bill, will not help. The courts can not. Why should not Congress, then, do the strong, helpful thing for the country? Why should it palter here, where every consideration calls for virile, courageous, adequately remedial legislation?

Such legislation was in the minds of those who framed this pledge in the Progressive national platform of 1912:

> We urge the establishment of a strong Federal administrative commission of high standing, which shall maintain permanent active supervision over industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce, or such of them as are of public importance, doing for them what the Government now does for the national banks, and what is now done for the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Such a commission must enforce the complete publicity of those corporation transactions which are of public interest; must attack unfair competition, false capitalization and special privilege, and by continuous trained watchfulness guard and keep open equally to all the highways of American commerce.

THE THREE PROGRESSIVE BILLS.

For it must be plain that the primary necessity in dealing with the great industrial corporations is to provide for an administrative body of quasi judicial powers competent to deal adequately with the complicated and perplexing questions arising out of unfair trade practices and private control of industry of such extent as to be a menace to the community.

Let me give in detail the provisions of the Progressive bills: The first Progressive bill (H. R. 9299) provides for the creation of an interstate trade commission, consisting of several members appointed by the President for terms of seven years each, one expiring every year. Each commissioner is to receive a salary of $10,000, in order that men of requisite experience and capacity may be drafted into this service.

In order that the commission may not be swamped with the impossible task of even obtaining definite information concerning the condition of the myriad small businesses in the Nation its jurisdiction is limited to those corporations or associations whose gross annual receipts from business within the United States exceed $3,000,000, excluding from the jurisdiction those corporations coming within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

For the handling of any problem the first requirement is definite information and an assurance of continuing means for acquiring such information. The first power and duty, therefore, to be conferred upon the Interstate Trade Commission is to obtain from the concerns subject to it complete information as to their "organization, conduct, management, security holders, financial condition, and business transactions," and to require from such concerns "complete access at all reasonable times to their records, books, accounts, minutes, papers, and all other documents, and including the records of any of their executive or other committees." In addition to this, power is given the committee to require uniform and comparable methods of accounting, in order that the statistics prepared by the commission may be effectively intelligible.

When the commission itself is adequately informed, the second obvious need is that the public shall be likewise enlightened, and therefore the commission is empowered to criticize and make public for the advancement of fair, honest, and efficient business "all cases of material overcapitalization, unfair competition, misrepresentation, or oppressive use of credit."

In view of the numerous difficulties in enforcing decrees of dissolution entered under the Sherman Act, an incidental power given to the commission is to assist a court having this responsibility which cares to utilize the aid of the commission.

It has been an unfortunate defect in much well-intentioned legislation that commissions created have been endowed with such feeble powers as to be practically useless. The Interstate Trade Commission therefore has been given plenary powers to accomplish the purposes not only of the first progressive bill but of the second and third bills and any additional legislation. The commission is empowered to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all documents needed for its investigations, and the aid of the district courts of the United States may be invoked in compelling obedience to its orders. These powers are most elaborately worked out in this bill.

The first Progressive bill, therefore, creates a commission with the power to sweep away from illegitimate business the protections of secrecy, to develop facts, and to act upon them.

THE POWER TO PROTECT FROM UNFAIR PRACTICES.

The great work before the Interstate Trade Commission, after it has adequately informed itself concerning the conditions with which it must deal, and after business enterprises and the public have been shown where wrongdoing exists, is to protect the smaller, weaker business organizations from the oppressive and unfair competition of their more powerful rivals. The second Progressive bill, therefore, begins with the declaration "that unfair or oppressive competition in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, as hereinafter defined, is hereby declared to be unlawful." The act then proceeds to enumerate various unfair business practices. But it should be noted that the term "unfair competition" is in a large measure self-defined. The courts have defined, in great variation and elaboration, numerous business dealings as "unfair competition." There is that in the common sense of fairness and right dealing which indicates plainly the distinction between close bargaining and oppression—between "puffing" of goods and fraudulent misrepresentation. The developing moral sense in the community adds constantly to the number of outlawed business practices. Therefore the commission should be so empowered that it may apply the accepted standards of honorable business to the enterprises within its jurisdiction. In section 3 of the second Progressive bill certain business practices are definitely condemned. "The acceptance or procurement of rates or terms of service from common carriers not granted to other shippers under like conditions"; the acceptance or procurement of rates or terms of service declared unlawful by the Elkins Act; arbitrary discrimination in selling prices between localities or individuals; obtaining secrets of competitors by bribery and like means or procuring dishonest conduct by employees of competitors; making oppressive exclusive contracts for the sale of articles over which the seller has a substantial monopoly; maintaining secret subsidiaries or agencies held out as independent; and, finally, "any other business practices involving unfair or oppressive competition."

Having established what are unfair trade practices, the Interstate Trade Commission is given the power to summon a corporation or association to appear before it and show cause why an order should not be issued by the commission restraining the concern from engaging in a designated form of unfair competition. If a corporation refuses to obey such an order the commission is empowered to invoke the aid of a district court of the United States, and the court authorized to enforce the orders of the commission by injunction or, in case of violation of injunction, to restrain the offender from engaging in interstate commerce. By this means the corporation is placed on an equal footing with the wrongdoing individual, who may be confined and restrained from engaging in business as a penalty for his failure to obey the law.

THE EFFECTUAL WAY TO BREAK UP MONOPOLY.

In the Third Progressive bill the jurisdiction of the Interstate Trade Commission is enlarged in order that it may give adequate protection to commerce against monopoly. The commission is empowered and directed upon its own initiative or upon complaint to investigate any corporation or association subject to its jurisdiction to determine whether or not such concern exercises "substantially monopolistic power."

In the second section it is provided that a corporation or association—shall be regarded as exercising a "substantially monopolistic power" whenever such corporation or association not being subject to the obligation of public service in the given industry in question exercises control over a sufficient portion of such industry or over sufficient factors therein to determine the price policy in that industry, either as to raw materials or finished or partly finished products.

Such power is thereupon declared to be contrary to public policy.

In arriving at this definition the ablest authorities on economic and commercial problems have been consulted and the ripest wisdom of the time, so far as obtainable, has been brought to bear upon this important question.

Donald R. Richberg, of Chicago, a student of note on this subject, has said:

The crux of monopoly is the ability to determine price policy. With this ability not present there can be no real monopoly. If this ability is present, monopolistic power is found. The only exception should be made in what has been phrased "the obligation of public service." There are those concerns wherein certain forms of competition mean expense and discomfort to the public. Unmistakably is this true in the matter of telephones. In like manner in fields outside that of public service the best interests of the community may demand a single service rather than competing enterprises, but only coincident with the recognition of the obligation of public service. In other words, if the natural force of competition makes the producer or the distributor responsive to the needs of the community, the community will be adequately served. In the absence of the corrective of this force there must be an equally powerful force requiring service to the community. The obligations imposed on the common carrier point the way plainly. Any enterprise to which the community must look for service must be dedicated to public service. The very term private enterprise indicates that it is not a matter of community concern. If one private individual does not satisfy, another will take his place. But when that private enterprise becomes a necessity to the community the public need inevitably makes it subject to a public obligation. The power to determine price policy is the power of monopoly, but when the price policy is subject to a public obligation there is ipso facto no private power to determine it, and therefore no monopolistic power. The two are irreconcilable. There is no regulation of monopoly, for example, in any strict and honest sense in the power exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission over common carriers. A railroad may be the only line of transportation between two cities, but it does not exercise monopolistic power so long as it can not determine the price policy upon which its transportation rates are fixed. The tendency of private business to remain private will inevitably restrict most business expansion inside the line where a private business becomes public. Therefore if by law it is provided that the mere fact that the growth of an enterprise to proportions comparable to monopoly will mean the assumption of public responsibilities, that law will necessarily operate to check automatically the ambitions of captains of industry to enlarge their fields of operation beyond the limits where they may still control their own enterprises. The imposition upon apparently monopolistic power or the responsibilities properly incident thereto will deter purely selfishly ambitious capitalists from the acquisition of such power far more effectively than the mere taboo of a civil or criminal law.

Having determined upon what that monopolistic power is which is hostile to the best interests of business, it becomes the duty of the commission proposed in the Progressive bills upon making an investigation to determine the existence of such monopolistic power—to find out whether the alleged power is based upon what are termed artificial or natural causes. Artificial causes for the purposes of the third Progressive bill are defined as those acts of unfair competition which are set forth in the second bill and here repeated. The duty of the commission upon finding an antipublic power, based upon unfair trade practices, is plainly to enforce the provisions of the second bill. But the commission may find that the alleged monopolistic power is based upon the so-called natural causes which, for the purposes of the bill, are defined as—

AA. Control of natural resources.

BB. Control of terminal or transportation facilities.

CC. Control of financial resources.

DD. Any other economic condition inherent in the character of the industry.

(The fact that in the conduct of an industry it is necessary to use certain patented articles conferring an inevitable monopoly would be classed under DD.)

If the commission shall find that a corporation or association exercises "substantially monopolistic power" based not on wrongdoing but on the so-called natural causes defined, it is made the duty of the commission to issue an order to the concern, specifying "such changes in the organization, conduct, or management of its property and business, as, in the opinion of the commission, will most effectively and promptly terminate such monopolistic power, while at the same time safeguarding property rights and business efficiency."

THE PROVISION FOR SUPERVISORS.

It is to be trusted that a careful reading of this provision may silence the false tongues that continually clamor about the Progressive Party as standing for the acceptance of monopoly. Not only is no such doctrine put forth in this bill, but also the bill does not content itself with mere denunciation or taboo for all monopoly. A definite intelligent means is provided for dealing with monopolistic power and terminating its existence. If a corporation or association refuses to comply with the order of the commission, the commission is not left helpless, nor is the whole problem foolishly cast upon the overburdened shoulders of a judiciary hopelessly unfitted to deal with it.

In section 6 it is provided that when a corporation or association refuses to comply with the order of the commission specifying the necessary changes to terminate monopolistic power, the commission may apply to a district court of the United States "for the appointment of a supervisor or supervisors of such corporation or association, and it shall be the duty of such court upon such request by the commission to appoint for a limited time such supervisor or supervisors for such corporation or association, and to give such supervisors such powers as are usually granted to receivers and full power of such direction and control over the organization, conduct, and management of such corporations as shall be best fitted to carry into effect the order of the commission."

Following this procedure the supervisors report to the commission regarding the organization and business effected, and are granted the power to carry out the further orders of the commission in order that the commission may be intimately informed as to the best methods for terminating the monopolistic power involved, and in order that in the meantime the business may be run for the benefit of the investor and the community alike. When a definite plan has been worked out whereby the corporation may be restored completely to its private ownership under terms guaranteeing the protection of commerce, the court may in terminating the supervisory control "in order to insure the permanency of competitive conditions include in its decree a provision submitting the supervised corporation or association and its business or any part thereof to the supervision or direction of the commission for such time and in such manner as said court shall fix."

THE STANDARDS OF FAIR BUSINESS.

It may be that the solution of a particular question involved in the acquisition of monopolistic power will be the separation of one factor of the business, establishing either its independence or its subjection to the obligation of public service. It may be that the solution will be the separation of a concern into two or more parts which will necessarily be responsive to natural competition. It may be merely a change in an administrative form of management, such as the breaking up of an interlocking directorate or some similar purely mechanical change. These are not questions to which the answers can be worked out in advance in a law. These are properly matters of administration. No set rule can be nor should be laid down. The standards of fair business, the standards of safe business, should be prescribed by the law of the land, and it should be made the duty of an executive body of adequate power and prestige to enforce such standards without fear and without favor and with dispatch.

Upon such a solution the country waits. Every consideration of public welfare calls for its consummation with dispatch. Every hesitant, halting, half step which stops short of this solution is deplorable and indefensible. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I was going to make a point of order that there is no quorum present, but I will withdraw it now. There are only 16 Democrats present, and only 16 have been present during the delivery of this speech, and I just wanted the RECORD to show that.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make a point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have withdrawn it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not care what remarks the gentleman makes so long as he withdraws the point of order.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to my friend from Connecticut to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to show, Mr. Chairman, that this great volume of business has been dominated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and yet he is not present, and practically none of them is present except one.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield to the gentleman for that purpose. The gentleman from Illinois has a good and sufficient reason for his absence, and we understand it.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution of the Legislature of Rhode Island in support of another bill—the coast guard bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the resolution indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT] is recognized.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, while there have been attempts to question the expediency of the pending legislation, they have proceeded either from a misconception of the purpose of the bill or a disregard of conditions which render its enactment a necessity. Such measures do not proceed from mere legislative initiative; there is a period preceding legislative action when public discussion forms public opinion and when the issues are more clearly defined and the subject more completely understood. This was the case when the act to regulate commerce was passed. There had been discussion for years. Many expedients had been attempted. But at last the matter came before Congress for action as a necessity. The enactment of the law followed, rather modest in its provisions, but they have been extended so as to embrace almost the whole field of transportation regulation. Hearings have been held in relation to the subject of an interstate trade commission by committees of the Senate and the House, it has been discussed before public bodies and in the press, and the public demand as well as the public necessity for such a measure can hardly be questioned.

Then there are those who say that the bill does not go far enough. Some would give judicial functions to the commission, but the committee believed that the provisions of the bill deal effectively with trade practices through publicity. The great mass of the business men of this country are straight and honest, and this bill is for their protection. Success in business rests on credit, upon the confidence of the people of a community in the fairness of a dealer. Unfair practices can not stand publicity, and it should prove an effective instrument for their removal. When we deal with the commerce of the country we are dealing with a very sensitive and highly organized process of our national life. It is not the purpose to put a ban upon legitimate business or to embarrass and injure it. It is believed that legitimate business will be advanced and aided by the suppression of illegitimate and unfair practices. Great changes have taken place in the organization and methods of business, not only by reason of growth, but also by reason of the complexity of its details and the widening field of activity. Rules and standards which prevailed are found inadequate.

The commission, by the information which it can give, will make present conditions known and honest business men will conform their practices and methods to them, and those who pursue methods and practices of another kind will find that the disclosures of the commission will render unfair dealing much more difficult and much less profitable. It can not be disputed that unfair practices and dishonest methods in business are economically wasteful. The intelligent man of business knows this to be so. But he is entitled to know the practices that are pursued, and it is possible for only a very few of the largest establishments to obtain the information that all should possess. This commission will render a large amount of information accessible, not only information of practices, but information of business methods as well. So the publicity provided by this bill should increase efficiency in production and distribution. It is not wise to be satisfied with conditions as they exist. With increasing population there are new conditions; there is no longer a frontier; the public land has been practically exhausted for several years; and for increased production reliance must be placed upon new and better methods. If there is to be progress, there must be increasing efficiency. In a social organization as vast and complex as ours, with a people whose restless energy has given the power of wonderful achievement, honest and efficient methods become a vital element in commerce. This bill will furnish an instrument by which the business men of the country can be informed of the matters concerning which information is most needed and often most difficult to obtain. For the purpose of obtaining publicity it is provided that all the powers, authority, and duties of the Bureau of Corporations are vested in the commission; but one change should be noted, and that is that while only so much of the information obtained by the Bureau of Corporations in its investigations as the President directs shall be made public, by this bill it is provided that the information obtained by the commission may be made public in the discretion of the commission. So in the exercise of its other powers information which the commission is not directed to make public may be made public in its discretion. Wide as the field of business is in this country, the scope of this bill is such that all facts of vital importance, except those relating to transportation, can be made known through the commission which it creates.

The investigations conducted by the commission under sections 3 and 9 of the bill will undoubtedly disclose facts relating to monopolies, and section 10 authorizes the commission upon the direction of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation. In many cases the public knowledge of the facts will destroy the evils. Monopolies have few supporters now outside those interested in them and the Socialists who see in the establishment of monopoly a long step toward the Government operation of industries. It is not to be taken for granted, however, that the brutal methods which in many cases have accompanied the creation of monopolies will be easily or quickly removed. But these powers of the commission will render it a ready and powerful instrument in accomplishing the result so earnestly desired.

In the enforcement of the antitrust laws one of the chief difficulties encountered has been the preparation of a decree which will effectually destroy the monopoly after it has been found by the court to exist. It is very often a matter requiring the most patient and careful investigation, involving not only the exercise of judicial powers but of trained administrative skill as well. And it is provided that in any suit in equity brought by the Attorney General under the antitrust acts the court may, upon the conclusion of the testimony, if then of the opinion that the complainant is entitled to relief, refer the suit to the commission to ascertain and report an appropriate form of decree, which the court may adopt or reject, in whole or in part, as in the case of the report of a master in equity causes, and may enter such decree as the nature of the case may in its judgment require. So that in the commission the courts will be furnished with a means of ascertaining and collecting the very matters of information which by the usual methods of legal procedure they may be unable to obtain.

I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] will recognize the fact that if this power had been possessed by a commission organized as this commission will be before the decree in the Standard Oil case was framed, the results of that case would have been far different, and that there would have been an actual dissolution of that monopoly in every one of its parts. But the aid to be furnished by the commission will not end with its report of an appropriate form of decree when requested by a court. Whenever a final decree has been entered against any defendant corporation in any suit brought by the United States to prevent and restrain any violation of the antitrust acts, the commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, upon its own initiative or upon the application of the Attorney General, to make investigation of the manner in which the decree has been or is being carried out. It shall transmit to the Attorney General a report embodying its findings as a result of any such investigation, and the report shall be made public in the discretion of the commission. This provision assures the people of this country that every decree dissolving an unlawful combination will be observed. There will be a sentry always on guard.

Those who say that this bill does not go far enough must realize that there is such a thing as going too far. It is possible to load the commission with powers that it can not exercise, to introduce questions of constitutional construction which may render the measure invalid in whole or in part. This bill, if passed, establishes an interstate trade commission, and that body in administering the provisions of the law will ascertain what further powers are required and the manner in which they can best be exercised. It is undoubtedly true that from time to time the jurisdiction of the commission will be enlarged, but it should be done gradually, when the work of the commission proves it necessary. In my opinion this bill should prove a great aid to the business men of the country in removing unfair practices, in extending knowledge of business methods, producing greater efficiency in production and distribution. I believe, too, it will prove a powerful ally to the courts in the enforcement of the antitrust laws, making effective the provisions of those laws and rendering the judgments of the courts more difficult to evade. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Minnesota wish to use some time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I shall have but one more speech, so that he can use all of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, quite recently a discussion has arisen concerning the proposed purchase of foreign bunting for the purpose of making our national flags for our Navy. Be it said to the credit of that department that if the project was ever contemplated it is now considered to be thrown aside.

Some of us have very fixed notions and sentiments as to who should salute our flag and as to whom should be invited or required to so salute. Under any circumstances any unusual reference to the national flag calls out a jealous question or criticism. Bills have recently been introduced in this House providing for a change or a rearrangement of the constellation of stars in the field of blue from that which has obtained during the last century. These bills have called out the protest of a patriotic organization in my district, as follows:

AURORA, NEBR., May 6, 1914.

CHARLES H. SLOAN, M. C.

DEAR SIR: Jack Chandler Woman's Relief Corps, of Aurora, Nebr., present a memorial and desire to have it read to the Sixty-third Congress of the United States:

"Whereas certain bills have been introduced in the Senate and House for a change in the United States flag:

"We, the officers and members of the Woman's Relief Corps, at a meeting held May 6, 1914, by unanimous vote, do most earnestly protest against any change whatever in our flag that our soldiers imperiled their lives to preserve, and which is known to all nations as the emblem of liberty and equality."

Respectfully,

SARAH FAITH, President.
ELLA F. ELASTON, Secretary.

[Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is recognized for 22 minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I shall use all of the 22 minutes that the gentleman from Minnesota has so generously allotted to me. At the beginning I want to say this, that while I agree with my friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] in many matters of legislation I do not share the fears that are, apparently, entertained by the gentleman relative to the inefficiency of this proposed law. I am not entirely satisfied with it. There are some things that I should like to have had otherwise; but, in my judgment, this law will be productive of much good. It will not prove to be inefficient; and if it comes to a vote in anything like the form in which it now exists it will receive my support.

It is a very curious thing that those who are opposed to this bill base their opposition upon such contrary grounds. I understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] to be somewhat opposed to the measure because he did not think it gave to the commission power enough. I have before me a circular, a copy of which, I suppose, was sent to every Member of the House, in which the bill is criticized, not because it does not give anyone power enough, not because it does not vest sufficient power in the commission, but because it vests too much power in the commission.

The bill is criticized because, under its terms, it is proposed that this commission shall not be subject to the Commissioner of Corporations or to the head of the Department of Commerce, or even to the President. The bill is criticized because the authors of it have made an attempt to make this commission an independent body, responsible only to the American people. I am frank to say that, in my judgment, that is one of the reasons why this bill is to be commended—because it contemplates the creation of a commission that shall not be subject to anybody in the Government, but shall be subject only to the people of the United States. I hope and believe that if this bill shall be enacted into law it will not be possible to have such a situation as to corporate control and political management as we find at present.

I was just examining a copy of the Congressional Directory, and I find in that Congressional Directory that the present United States Commissioner of Corporations is Hon. Joseph E.

Davies. I do not mean to suggest any criticism of that official of the Government or to make any comment whatsoever on the way in which he is discharging his duties, but I am simply calling attention to a peculiar situation. The head of the Bureau of Corporations is the Hon. Joseph E. Davies. I hold in my hand a copy of the World Almanac for the year 1914. At page 709 I find a list of the members of the Democratic national committee: Chairman, Hon. William F. McCombs, of New York City; secretary, Joseph E. Davies, of Madison, Wis. I do not know personally whether the Joseph E. Davies whose name appears here as Commissioner of Corporations is the same Joseph E. Davies whose name appears as secretary of the Democratic national committee; I am not fully posted in that regard.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FESS. I am posted on that subject. He is the same person.

Mr. WILLIS. I rather assumed that he was. In fact, it is a matter of common information that he is the same person. I am not criticising anybody about that, although it is rather an unfortunate situation, it seems to me; but I am saying that the object of this bill is to create a body, a commission, an organization that shall not be under political domination or control, and that there shall not be the probability or possibility of such a thing. It seems to me that is a commendable feature of the bill—the idea that this commission is to be entirely separate and apart from any existing department of the Government, not subject to the orders of the President, not compelled to report to the President or to the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. What will prevent the President appointing Mr. Davies as a member of this commission?

Mr. MADDEN. He would be only one of three then.

Mr. WILLIS. I can not conceive of the present Chief Executive, or any other President of the United States, doing such a thing as that. After the discussion that has been had upon this bill, after the country had been made to understand that the specific purpose of this legislation is to create a body that should be entirely outside of political control, I do not think that will be done. At any rate, no person would be appointed to membership on the interstate trade commission and at the same time be allowed to serve as an official of any political campaign committee; such an act would be shocking and almost inconceivable to those who believe that our courts and administrative officials should be entirely free from political domination.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Does the gentleman recall the fact that when Mr. Roosevelt was a candidate for reelection Mr. Cortelyou was made chairman of the Republican national committee, and was at the same time Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. WILLIS. My recollection is that became a matter of discussion and criticism; but, speaking as a friend of this bill, I think it is a poor defense for gentlemen upon that side to refer to such a condition as that. I am in favor of this bill, notwithstanding the condition that the gentleman has referred to. I do not believe that thing will be done under this bill. I do not believe any President would appoint a person high in the councils of a political organization to membership on this interstate trade commission.

Mr. Chairman, in the deliberations of this committee, without unduly disclosing any committee secrets, I wish to say that no reference is ever made to politics. This bill was drawn without reference to political considerations of any kind whatsoever. Republicans and Democrats and the Progressive member all cooperated together to prepare this legislation.

In this connection it is only fair to state that while the Republican members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce are not entirely satisfied with the provisions of this bill, and are of the opinion that experience will demonstrate the need of carefully added powers, nevertheless they express their general concurrence in the principles involved in the bill in the following language from the minority report, signed by all the Republican members:

> The Republican members on the committee realized the great interest in it by the business organizations and thoughtful citizens interested in the public welfare, as well as its consequence and opportunity for good to the people of the country. Thus its consideration has proceeded with a sincere desire on our part to assist in the preparation of the legislation along the lines which would seem to meet both the public expectations and necessities, and yet not be oppressive so as to injure individual effort and initiative.
> The majority members of the committee have freely conferred with the members of the minority and have received their cordial cooperation in the formation of this measure. The legislation as reported is such in general as we approve, although individual differences necessarily exist as to the wisdom and scope of some of its provisions and details.
> This measure follows substantially the declaration of the last platform of the Republican national convention as follows:
> "FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.
> "In the enforcement and administration of Federal laws governing interstate commerce and enterprises impressed with a public use engaged therein, there is much that may be committed to a Federal trade commission, thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts. This will promote promptness in the administration of the laws and avoid delays and technicalities incident to court procedure."
> In some respects this bill has not the scope outlined in the platform in conferring administrative powers over some classes of business. But we feel that such should be gradually evolved and assumed after more extensive experience and discussion.
> The reported measure does not transfer to the commission any function now exercised by the courts, but will be of assistance to the courts in the enforcement of the laws regulating commerce.

In this pamphlet of criticism to which I referred just a little while ago it was said that no hearings were held upon this bill. In the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce we do not hold hearings upon bills. We hold hearings upon subjects. We had hearings day after day, and I think I may safely say week after week, on the subject of the creation of a trade commission. We had some trouble in getting the gentlemen who were testifying to confine their remarks to that subject, but the chairman finally succeeded in doing it. We had hearings upon the subject of the creation of a trade commission, not upon this specific bill or any other bill, but upon that general subject. We collected information from every source from which we could get it, and I, as a Republican member of that committee, felt that in presenting this bill to the House we were doing something which would not only meet with the approval of the level-headed, conservative business men of this country, that we were preparing a bill which would be of benefit to the people of the United States, but at the same time I felt that we had ample political precedent and political authority for such action.

The fact is that, with the exception of the Democratic Party, practically all the political parties in the last campaign in their platforms specifically provided for some such legislation as this. I do not recall anything in the Democratic platform on the subject of the creation of a trade commission. I do recall that in the Progressive platform that idea was indorsed, and I have before me the provisions of the Republican platform on the subject of a Federal trade commission. Here is what the Republican platform said:

> In the enforcement and administration of Federal laws governing interstate commerce and enterprises impressed with a public use engaged therein there is much that may be committed to a Federal trade commission thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts. This will promote promptness in the administration of the laws and avoid delays and technicalities incident to court procedure.

Consequently I believe that in taking up this legislation we are proceeding under very excellent political authority. As I said when I began, there are some provisions of this bill that do not meet with my approval, and I find one of those provisions in section 2, which, among other things, fixes the salaries of the commissioners, and then goes on and says that this commission shall have the authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other officials, clerks, and employees as it may find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may from time to time be appropriated for by Congress.

I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that in the creation of a new department, or a new commission, or a new bureau, it is not always possible in advance to say just what clerical assistance will be needed; but I do believe that in this case it would have been better to have made the effort, at least. I do not believe in the principle, either in State or in national legislation, of creating an office and then allowing the head of that office to appoint whomsoever he pleases, at whatsoever compensation he may fix. I believe it is unwise legislation to do so, and that it tends to build up an autocratic bureaucracy not responsible to the people. I think we ought not to encourage the system of lump-sum appropriations; I believe that in this case we might have done as we did when the Children's Bureau was created. In that case we undertook to provide, so far as we could, what help should be employed; that there should be so many clerks of this class and that class, at salaries fixed by law. We undertook to be specific. But in this section here we do not do that. We unwisely leave to the commission the power of appointing whatever officers and employees it pleases, at salaries to be fixed by the appointing power. The number and class of employees and the salaries they are to receive should be definitely fixed by law.

In that connection it might be interesting to know what Thomas Jefferson, who is sometimes quoted by our friends on the other side—quoted, but frequently forgotten—had to say on the subject of lump-sum appropriations, which, of course, must necessarily come if we pass the bill in its present form. Here is what he said in his first annual message:

In our care of the public contributions intrusted to our direction it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible to definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object or transcending it in amount; by reducing the field of contingencies and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money where the examinations may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.

In other words, it was laid down by Thomas Jefferson, and has been followed in most cases by the Governments of this country—State and national—that so far as possible appropriations should be specific. I believe that we should have gone further than we did go in this bill in undertaking to say what force should be provided for the use of this commission and what salaries they should receive.

To those who think this commission does not have sufficient power let me say that if they will read sections 8 and 9 of the bill and consider carefully the provisions therein outlined they will be convinced that this commission has great power. Section 8 provides that the commission from time to time may make rules and regulations and classifications of corporations for the purpose of carrying out the provision of the act.

Section 9 provides that all corporations engaged in commerce, as defined in the act, with a capital in excess of $5,000,000, shall make certain reports and shall furnish to the commission certain information. That means a statement of the normal facts that the people of the country are entitled to have and which no corporation doing a legitimate business ought to object to giving for public information. What are some of these facts? The records of its organization, the bondholders, the stockholders, the financial condition, and also such information, statements, and records of its relations to other corporations and its business and practices while engaged in commerce as the commission may require. That information is to be obtained not simply from corporations engaged in interstate commerce or in commerce as defined under the provisions of this act—not simply those corporations with a capital in excess of $5,000,000, but also corporations engaged in interstate commerce with a capital less than $5,000,000, provided they come within the classification established by the commission. What is the purpose of that provision? It is perfectly evident that there might be a corporation that was engaged in monopolistic practices that still would not have a capital stock of $5,000,000.

This commission, through the power vested in it under section 8, has the power to classify and to require those corporations to make reports. Oh, but, some gentleman says, "That is all there is to it; they simply make reports; they simply give information that does not amount to anything." I invite the attention of Members of the House to the fact that every publicist who has investigated this question, every man, so far as I know, who has written upon the subject of our industrial relations and the corporation question, has insisted that the most potent and available remedy is publicity. If we want to improve the conditions in a city, the best way to do it is not to hire more policemen, not to attach more severe penalties to the commission of certain offenses, but to give that city more light, to provide better lighting facilities; and it is the same way with great corporations in the industrial world. Turn on the light of publicity. Give the public the facts. That is the project that is contemplated in this section here, and I think it will be productive of much good. The subcommittee, made up of Democrats and Republicans, who drafted this bill and who wrote the wise provisions of this section are entitled to great credit. The portion of section 9 referred to is as follows:

SEC. 9. That every corporation engaged in commerce, excepting corporations subject to the acts to regulate commerce, which, by itself or with one or more other corporations owned, operated, controlled, or organized in conjunction with it so as to constitute substantially a business unit, has a capital of not less than $5,000,000, or, having a less capital, belongs to a class of corporations which the commission may designate, shall furnish to the commission annually such information, statements, and records of its organization, bondholders and stockholders, and financial condition, and also such information, statements, and records of its relation to other corporations and its business and practices while engaged in commerce as the commission shall require; and to enable it the better to carry out the purposes of this act the commission may prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports. The said annual reports shall contain all the required information and statistics for the period of 12 months ending with the fiscal year of each corporation's report, and they shall be made out under oath or otherwise, in the discretion of the commission, and filed with the commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission. The commission may also require such special reports as it may deem advisable.

Another section to which I wish to call attention is section 10, which is in full as follows:

SEC. 10. That upon the direction of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress the commission shall investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation. The report of the commission may include recommendations for readjustment of business in order that the corporation investigated may thereafter maintain its organization, management, and conduct of business in accordance with law. Reports made after investigation under this section may be made public in the discretion of the commission.

For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation or proceeding authorized by this section the commission, or its duly authorized agent or agents, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against.

This is the section which authorizes this commission to investigate and report on the facts relating to any alleged violation of the antitrust act. This may be done by direction of the President, by direction of the Attorney General, or at the direction of either House of Congress; it should be noted that the information so obtained is to be made public at the discretion of the commission. No commissioner of corporations, no officer who is responsible to the President or who is responsible to any Cabinet officer or to any political campaign committee has the power to say whether or not these facts should be made public. These facts can not be used in a fat-frying program. These facts are for the benefit of the people. They are to be given to the public at the discretion of the interstate trade commission. I think that is a wise provision, because it makes this interstate trade commission absolutely independent of any exterior authority in that regard. And the same provision occurs in section 13, in which it is again provided that the facts that are to be ascertained under the investigations outlined in that section shall be made public at the discretion of the commission. Then, further, in section 17, there is a provision for an elaborate annual report, and still the business men and the corporations of the country are properly protected in their rights. No trade secrets can be disclosed in this report.

It can not be said that there is an inquisition, that facts are to be obtained, and that then these facts are given out in such a way as to enable business competitors to use them. That is distinctly provided against in the following language in section 17:

Provided, That no trade secrets or private lists of customers shall be embraced in any such abstract.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that while I am not entirely satisfied with all the provisions of this bill, while I do not think it is a strict compliance with the terms of the Republican platform, I do say that it is drawn along those lines, and I compliment the members of the subcommittee, Republicans and Democrats, upon the fact that they disregarded political considerations in the drafting of the bill. I especially compliment the Democrats that they ignored the fact that their own platform did not say anything about this and took the Republican platform as their guide. While I am not entirely satisfied with the work, I believe that it is a step in the right direction; I believe that it will accomplish much of good; and as the years go by and it becomes apparent from experience that the interstate trade commission should be strengthened in this direction or in that, that it should be given additional powers, then these powers can be granted and the necessary amendments made, and we shall witness, I predict, in this country, growing out of this apparently humble legislation, the development of a great power for good in the protection of honest business and the encouragement of legitimate enterprise like unto that which we have seen in the powerful, beneficent, and incorruptible Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the pride of American jurisprudence and the guardian of the people's rights. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, is all of my time exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOWLER). The gentleman from Minnesota has exhausted his time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield first to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield now so much of the remaining time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] as he may care to use.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has just stated that this bill does not in its entirety meet his approval. We all must confess what is a serious difficulty in legislation, namely, that it is a result of an accommodation of ideas, certainly to those who seek to adjust their views to a common purpose. Reconciliation of divergent and conflicting views is the great task of parliaments.

Mr. Chairman, the genius of the American people is against monopoly and for competition. How far that genius has been created or fostered by the common-law system of the English-speaking race I do not now care to address myself, however inviting the subject. Certainly the common law has tended to create an equality of opportunity and a fair rivalry in economic and industrial life. The Sherman antitrust law was intended to confirm the common law, to preserve and conserve competition, and to affirm anew America's hostility to monopoly.

The committee will appreciate that in dealing with the great commerce of our country we are confronted with a dual jurisdiction by reason of the dual character of our governments. To separate intrastate from interstate commerce is a difficulty which often presents itself. Under our system of government we are confronted at almost every step with this conflict of jurisdiction. Fortunately or unfortunately the other Governments of the world are not so hampered. The Federal Government has not the same power to deal with commerce that the State has with the commerce wholly within its jurisdiction. But I may observe, in passing, that the interstate clause in the Federal Constitution affords more depth for sounding and more shore lines for exploration than any other clause or section of that great instrument. In this clause is to be found the most potential principle for the breaking down of State lines or State sovereignty. So, Mr. Chairman, we should enact only such legislation as we are constitutionally clearly authorized to enact, and one who attempts to draft a bill of this character must do so with more or less solicitude. He does not know when the language, no matter how thoroughly considered, will throw the whole subject matter of the bill into the courts, and the bill may thereby be declared null and void. I am not complaining of this. Such an arrangement is, in my opinion, very wise and necessary. There may be in this bill certain matters intrusted to the commission which may relate to both State and interstate commerce. Of course there is no difficulty on this score unless Congress concludes that it must extend the field of regulation so as to include matters heretofore regarded as within the jurisdiction of the States in order to make effective the regulation of what is plainly interstate or foreign commerce.

But when we have left the conflict of sovereign jurisdictions, other jurisdictional questions insistently present themselves. For example, does the bill give to the commission legislative or judicial powers? If so, our work is in vain. I may say I do not think we have done so. We have diligently sought to avoid mistakes so grievous. But I have mentioned these jurisdictional and constitutional difficulties in order that the House may appreciate the embarrassments confronting the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the painstaking care which it has given to the preparation of the bill.

Again, when we authorize the commission to gain information from corporations, we are at once confronted with the question as to whether the method authorized and pursued constitutes an unreasonable seizure and search, so rigorously forbidden by the Constitution. So I submit to the committee that in undertaking to draft a bill of this character it is better to have a law that can be hereafter added to than one that must hereafter be subtracted from. It is better in legislation of this particular character that the law will clear its skirts in the outset of the juridical domain. We should avoid litigation in the start. I would apply this observation most respectfully to the bill of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. He wants something vigorous, something masterful, to control what he terms "crooked business." He does not seem to have thought, if his own bill is an index of his thoughts, that this control may be relaxed by the juridical hand of our Government. He wants expedition, but expedition is haste slowly made in a matter so vital as this, unless every constitutional objection is fully met. I venture the opinion that the bill of the gentleman from Kansas would not successfully run the gauntlet of the courts.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman served on the subcommittee that helped to prepare this bill, if I recall?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I had that honor with my colleague, Mr. STEVENS, and others.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Without betraying the confidence of the subcommittee and of the full Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, will the gentleman inform this committee to what extent the committee examined the provisions of the so-called Murdock bill with a view of determining how far it could be made effective and what uncertainties it would create as to the business affairs of this country?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not intend addressing the committee, and therefore I would not like to rely upon the accuracy of my memory, but will say that we gave a very thorough study of the bills presented to us, and I think we arrived at practically the unanimous conclusion that the bill presented by the gentleman from Kansas was a very good speech, but very poor law. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask him if the committee did not conclude almost unanimously that the bill drafted by the gentleman from Kansas would stimulate litigation more than any other business?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I just suggested that it would throw us, to use the picturesque language of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], into an "orgy" of litigation.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Would it be a proper conclusion to draw that a bill that would be thus written and found unconstitutional by the courts would give additional reason to some people for recall of judges? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. If that were the object, perhaps the bill might contribute to this end.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I assume the subcommittee did not for a moment think that the provision of section 5 of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], to the effect that the commission might issue any order which in its opinion would effectively and promptly terminate such monopoly, was constitutional?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, briefly, I may say that the commission, under this bill, in my opinion, comprises legislative, executive, and judicial powers, powers which are incompatible. I think that will answer the question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And in addition, if the gentleman will allow, dispensing powers that are not contained in any judicial function?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is a very accurate appreciation of the measure.

Mr. Chairman, I would now address myself to the economic question directly and indirectly involved in this bill. I believe that the American people are not now ready for the extinction of competition. I believe that the great progress of America does not justify the relinquishment of competition, that great principle which has contributed so much to the progress and achievement of the American people. The bill offered by the gentleman from Kansas practically destroys competition as an industrial economic factor.

Bills have been offered which would empower this commission to fix the prices at which products of "big business" are to be sold. If you fix prices you must fix valuations, and if you fix valuations of property you must also fix the price of labor. The commission is then in a labyrinth of economic duties which could not be performed by the most enlightened men of this or any other country. The task is bewildering, and only the daring Socialist really desires the Government to perform so extraordinary a function, for thereby Government control and ownership of all business is begun.

This is a nonpartisan commission, Mr. Chairman. With the exception of one or two minor officials and certain expert officials, the officials and employees under the commission are selected by civil-service methods. The commission is lifted clean and bodily out of politics.

I sympathize with the remark of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who deplores that Mr. Davis, the present commissioner of corporations, was secretary of the Democratic national committee. But I recall that once we had a very distinguished gentleman who was at the same time a member of the Cabinet and chairman of one of the great parties of our country. We also had on the famous Tariff Board, constituted by President Taft, a gentleman who all too soon thereafter became secretary of the executive committee of the Republican Party. I do not say this in any spirit of criticism, but that none of us can throw stones.

Now, a word as to competition, which I think this bill was intended to effectuate in the industrial and economic life of the people. This is the underlying purpose of this bill. The trouble with competition has not been with competition itself, but with unfair competition, dishonest competition, the competition that gets rid of a rival, not by underselling him through legitimate economies or honest methods, but by brutal methods and by sinister and subtle means.

Take, for example, what is known as the "factors agreement," whereby a trust undertakes to boycott its merchant purchasers if they do not comply with its selling regulations; imposing terms upon such merchant purchasers by requiring a boycott of all independent producers. Under this sort of an agreement the trust having a great variety of products will refuse to sell the merchant or to give him the ordinary discounts if he buys the same class of goods from any competing establishment.

Again, the trust may make great varieties of one general kind of merchandise, while the competitor makes only one kind. In this way the trust will reduce the price on the particular competing article or product, but advance the price on the remaining varieties, thus crushing the smaller competitor.

Then, too, a trust or corporation covering a very large territory may sell its products below cost, or even give them away, within the territory of a small rival, the larger trust relying upon recouping by an excess of profits in distant fields in which the small competitor does not operate or cover. These are familiar examples of unfair competition and dishonest practices, which must be destroyed or restrained if competition is to survive.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. Of course, it is within the province of a very large corporation having immense capital and a very large line of employees to manufacture and dispose of its article for less money than the small corporation and yet be within the legitimate lines of its purposes, is it not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will answer the gentleman by saying yes. But I will go further and say that the mere size of a corporation does not so much frighten me as the wrongful methods which a large or small corporation may employ.

Mr. CLINE. I was pointing my question to the illegal methods to be employed by both corporations. Inasmuch as the large corporation is able to undersell the smaller corporation, by what methods, if any, does the gentleman propose to correct that condition so as to protect the smaller corporation?

Mr. MONTAGUE. By this bill.

Mr. CLINE. By the bill; yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill is corrective, among other things, in that the commission investigates corporations not only severally, but in relation to other corporations, and in relation to the performance of corporate and business functions, and then brings this information to the executive department, to the legislative department, to the Department of Justice, and, in some instances, to the judiciary itself. And the great public will have this information in the discretion of the commission. But, as a more direct answer, the bill assures to the small corporation fair competition.

Mr. CLINE. Would that be sufficient to protect the smaller corporation?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I submit that if it does not immediately prove effective it will be the beginning of a plan or a law that will soon lead to the protection of the smaller corporation. I have more faith, perhaps, than some in the power of publicity. The honest man seeks and courts it. The dishonest business man shrinks from it, because he can not stand the light when it is thrown upon him. And while I concede to the gentleman, whose courteous interruption I desire to acknowledge, that we can not say that this particular bill will at one step or stroke meet the evil which is in his mind, I nevertheless submit that it does set on foot processes that will revolutionize the economic and legislative mind of the people, and that it will immensely help in effecting efficient remedies for the evils we all acknowledge.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a large corporation by reason of its efficiency is able to sell its product cheaper than the small ones, and in a legitimate way and not by cutting prices in order to drive out the competitor, there is nothing in this bill, and ought not to be anything in the bill, that will prevent that?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think that would be a monopoly.

Mr. LARKLEY. So that the test that might be applied under the bill would be whether the cut in prices by the big corporation was unfair and inaugurated for the purpose of driving out a competitor?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, particularly; but the real test is whether it is monopolistic or not. And I will bring monopoly down to modern conditions. I will not let it rest upon the old case of Darcy against Allein, which stated with almost final authority not only the legal attributes of a monopoly but the economic and social wrongs of a monopoly.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is so well informed upon this proposition that I would like to press the inquiry a little further, with his permission.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. Suppose that both of these parties now are pursuing an absolutely legal method in the manufacture and distribution of their merchandise, the larger corporation not seeking by cut-throat methods to displace the smaller one, but in the very nature of things the larger corporation can legitimately make its articles and sell them at a less price than the smaller. How are you going to meet that situation, when the smaller corporation finds its products displaced by those of the larger corporation?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will not concede that, with all respect for the gentleman, as an accurate statement of the facts. It is not always the case that a large corporation can fairly win over the small corporation operating in the same field. The argument I was suggesting is this, that an element of unfair competition was in the large corporation if it came into the field occupied by the small corporation and therein undersold or, if need be, gave away a product similar to that made by the small corporation, and then in turn recoups itself for whatever loss it had incurred in the field occupied by the small corporation by charging a larger profit on its wares and products sold in fields or territory not covered by the small operator.

Mr. CLINE. Then it becomes a monopoly, and that goes outside of the pale of the question I was asking the gentleman. The large corporation then becomes liable under this statute if it does that?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Such competition is unfair and dishonest, in my opinion.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; but I had no idea of entering upon an economic discussion.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to involve the gentleman in an economic discussion. I just wanted to ask whether, as a matter of fact, this bill has anything whatever to do with the fixing of prices?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Nothing at all.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I thought.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill is to help to enforce the anti-trust law or any other pertinent law that is now or hereafter in existence. It is a bill for information. It is a bill for advice. It is a bill to secure the information, the facts necessary for the conduct of the business of the country, so far as the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government may desire or need that information.

Permit me to accentuate the idea that this bill provides information by reasonable methods, so that there will be no vagueness in business operations; not that any business may obtain an immunity from this commission, but business can gain information from it. If business does not gain it from the commission directly it will gain it in a secondary form through other officials of the Government—from the executive and legislative branches and from the judicial decrees. In other words, this commission has the authority and purpose of throwing a searchlight of fact and information upon the great economic and industrial business of the country. If we want to go further hereafter we shall have time and opportunity to do it.

There is an enlargement in this bill, as I understand it, of the functions of a master in chancery. This bill undertakes to develop a trained body of masters, of experts, who will help the court, if it has reached an opinion, to formulate a decree which will clearly fix the scope and meaning of the dissolution of any business so adjudicated.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman believe that any man ought to be placed on the judicial bench of our country or placed in the position of Attorney General who is not able to draw a decree dissolving a trust?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; or you may not be able to fill such offices. Great lawyers, great jurists, may not know how to draw an effective decree upon complex industrial subjects. We realize that the economic forces of America have moved faster than the political development of the machinery of our Government. We thought we had sounded the ultimate truth of government and had put it in final form through the instrumentality of a written Constitution. But our social and economic development has been so prodigious that we not infrequently find it in collision with the rather rigid legal and political forms of our system.

The bill meets one of these advances in business by enabling the court, after reaching an opinion, to have the help of the commission in formulating a decree that will meet the economic and industrial complications inherent in a subject which in the nature of the case few courts, no matter how learned in the law, would understand without expert help. I doubt, if this measure becomes a law, that any court would deal with such complex facts and conditions as confronted the courts in the Standard Oil and American Tobacco cases without calling upon the commission for assistance. The law, through a commission of the character contemplated by this bill, will thus expand and progress to meet the advanced and complex activities of our great industrial and commercial concerns.

This new function of the equity master is an effort of the legislative body to adjust our jurisprudence to our industrial and economic development. Therefore it is a very wise provision, in my opinion, that this commission shall aid the courts in formulating decrees to make effective the real vital judgments which may be rendered. Moreover, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], this advice or this aid will not tend to retard the progress of the administration of justice. On the other hand, it will tend to facilitate and expedite the administration of justice. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, the salient features of this bill are, first, the transfer of the Bureau of Corporations and the Commissioner of Corporations, with all their authorities and duties as to the investigation, management, and control of corporations provided for in the existing statute, to this commission, with power to act in the discharge of these duties independently of the Cabinet or the President; second, to confer upon the commission certain other duties upon the direction of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress, with power in the commission to make public, with certain obvious exceptions, the findings or information thus obtained; third, to render assistance to the courts in the manner I have heretofore stated; and, further, to correlate business in conformity to law.

These legislative contributions, Mr. Chairman, are adequate for our present needs, and we should at least test by actual experience this bill before enacting more comprehensive and radical legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the interstate trade commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission), which shall be composed of three commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than two of the commissioners shall be members of the same political party. The first commissioners appointed shall continue in office for terms of two, four, and six years, respectively, from the date of the taking effect of this act, the term of each to be designated by the President, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. The commission shall choose a chairman from its own membership. No commissioner shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, in line 6, strike out the word "three" and insert "five," and in line 8 strike out "two" and insert "three." In line 10, after the word "two," insert "three," and after the word "four" insert "five."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment which I have offered has no other effect than to increase the number of the commission from three to five. In my judgment, it is one of the most important subjects that could possibly engage the attention of the committee. It has been stated here by almost every formulator of this bill, by every member of the committee reporting it, and by everyone who will support it, that this House is not now committing to this commission all the authority that it is expected it will ultimately exercise. We know that very many additional powers will be given to the commission. But if it were to limit its work to the powers that by this bill are committed to it, it would be infinitely better for the commission, for the country, for those who will be affected by it, for this commission to be a commission of five rather than of three. Very much depends upon the initial impression that this commission makes upon the country. A commission composed of three men is, in the eyes of the people, almost a committee. The hearings before three men will by no means be as impressive as those before five. It will greatly dignify this commission if it shall be composed of the number of men that almost every one of us realizes ought to compose it. I understand very well the ideas that must have been in the minds of the committee with regard to the restriction of this number to three. I have no doubt that primarily it was the idea of economy. It would be better, it would save money from an economical standpoint, if the commission should be composed of three rather than of five. But, Mr. Chairman, in matters of this kind this amount of money that will be saved by the limitation of the number of the commission to three rather than five will not, in my judgment, be economically safe. It will be infinitely better that this commission shall be so created that it will meet all of the expectations of its sponsors; that it will meet the expectations of those who desire this legislation; that it shall disarm the criticisms of those who are to be affected by it. And I have no doubt whatever that we can not do this more effectually by any one single act than by making this commission a body of five commissioners rather than of three.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire very briefly to reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and to state that there is some force in the position which he asserts regarding the membership of a commission of this character; but the committee having charge of the framing of this bill weighed the situation very carefully, and they came to the conclusion that, with the functions to be performed by the commission at this time and with the necessity for a compact organization, in order to create the working force that will have to be built up for this commission, it would be better to start with three commissioners. Now, as a matter of fact, the Interstate Commerce Commission does not present that dignified aspect in point of numbers which the gentleman refers to. The real fact is that the Interstate Commerce Commission at this time nearly always sit with one or two members hearing great cases. At the present moment Commissioner McChord is hearing the great investigation into the affairs of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, regarding its flagrant violations of law. The dignity of that commission is not lessened by the number of the members who sit to hear any particular complaint, and the test of the trade commission's work will be how well its duties are performed and not how large a personnel it is composed of.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield.

Mr. TOWNER. Is not the very incident which the gentleman mentions an argument in favor of a larger commission? Are not the corporations that will be affected by this commission much more numerous than those which are affected by the Interstate Commerce Commission? And, as it finds it necessary to divide up in the hearings of these cases, will not the new commission find itself also compelled to divide up in the hearings of the cases which come before it?

Mr. COVINGTON. I think the functions performed by this proposed commission are those relating to the publicity to be secured through the ninth section of the bill and the investigations that will be conducted by the various special agents and investigators under the direction of the commission. And I will say to the gentleman, further, that one of the most comprehensive schemes for the reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission that has been proposed, and that has the sanction of the commission itself, is a re-created commission which shall be permitted to operate in groups of three members each.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. So far as I can see, an increase of the membership of this commission is not material in view of the small power which has been given the commission. Three members can handle the work that is provided in this bill probably as well as five. If the commission had more power and more activities under the scope of the bill, there would have to be more commissioners. The present Interstate Commerce Commission consists of seven members. It originally consisted of five. Undoubtedly the thing which occurred in respect to the Interstate Commerce Commission will occur under this bill—a growth of power. These commissioners have in this measure merely investigative powers. They go no further than that. Three men can exercise that function probably as well as five or seven, but it is inevitable under this sort of legislation, and after the creation of this sort of a commission, that within a year, or at best within two years, this commission, with its feeble powers, will be before Congress in its annual report, which is here provided, pleading with Congress to give it power, to give it other and more power than merely the right to investigate and optionally make public its findings. When that prayer comes there will be ample opportunity to increase the membership of the commission, and undoubtedly it will be increased. I see no particular point to be gained now by increasing the size of the commission. It will have no more dignity with five than it has with three. It is a feeble commission, and you can not increase its power by increasing its number.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section close in five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is going to run until 11 o'clock, is he not?

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we ought to have liberal debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think, as everyone has expressed accord with this measure, we should get through sooner than 11 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to be heard?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not care to speak; but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], who is upon his feet, and others would desire to be heard. I do not think there is any need for pressing the request at this time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. I believe that will accommodate all of the gentlemen who are on their feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has criticized the bill which is before the House and has referred somewhat indefinitely to provisions of a bill which was prepared by himself.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman would not yield to me.

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not, for lack of time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman had a world of time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, no; I did not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have only five minutes, and the gentleman had time that he did not use.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I used all of my time and could have used an hour and a half more.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I decline to yield. I think the House ought to better understand the provisions of the bill which the gentleman from Kansas has introduced, being the bill H. R. 9301, to protect commerce against monopolies.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is the most extraordinary bill that was ever brought before this or any other body.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield for the same reason as before. I have not the time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Really, will the gentleman yield——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WEAVER. Tell us about the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Never since the time when Moses wrote the Ten Commandments, never since the time when it was proposed to have government by law, did anybody ever introduce a measure providing that a judicial body might enter any decree that in its opinion should be entered in the case. It was reserved for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] for the first time to ever introduce before any body such a provision as that. In section 5 of the bill which the gentleman from Kansas introduced I find this provision with reference to the orders that the commission shall make:

> Said commission shall issue and serve upon such corporation or association a written order to said corporation or association specifying such changes in the organization, conduct, or management of its property and business as in the opinion of the commission will most effectively and promptly terminate such monopolistic power.

Of course it adds there the words:

> While at the same time safeguarding property rights and business efficiently.

But that is all in the opinion of the commission also. There is one provision in the bill that the gentleman from Kansas introduced that is in some respects an excellent one and in others entirely unnecessary. It is found right at the close of the bill, and it is the first time that I ever knew such a provision as that to be introduced. Section 12 of the bill, which is the last section, provides:

> SEC. 12. That if any provision or requirement of this act shall for any reason be held unconstitutional, the validity of the remaining provisions or requirements of this act shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. Chairman, if this provision which I first read was passed on by any court without any argument or without any discussion it would be held unconstitutional. Why, the commission is not required to render an order in accordance with the law and the facts. The law and the facts will not determine the matter before this commission. It is to render an order in accordance with its opinion, whatever it thinks ought to be done. That is the kind of statute the gentleman from Kansas wants to have adopted by this House and put into force.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The most arrogant, the most tyrannical government that has ever pretended to act under law would never undertake to pass such a provision as that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr MURDOCK. Talk about arrogance and tyranny. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, if this provision should be unconstitutional he provides that the rest of his bill would not be affected thereby, but the whole force and effect of the bill would be destroyed if this provision were held unconstitutional as certainly it would have to be. It may be that we would be ruled better and controlled better by some benevolent despot, or three, four, or five benevolent despots, authorized and empowered to enter any sort of a decree that in their opinion might be best, but the time has not yet come when the American people are ready to submit to anything of that kind. This country, Mr. Chairman, is governed by law, in accordance with the law, and under the Constitution that has not yet so far been dispensed with, although by this bill which the gentleman from Kansas has introduced for political effect it would be wiped out entirely.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, line 7, after the word, "President," insert the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it will be at once perceived that this amendment relates to the question of the independence and tenure and security in office of the men who will constitute this commission. I am not offering the amendment as one inimical to this bill. I am offering the amendment with the hope of improving it at a point where I think it requires improving. You will recognize that these commissioners are appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It seems to me that the proper balance would be preserved if their removal depended upon the same thing. An industrial commission is not a part of the executive department of the Government——

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In a moment. It is more nearly related to the judicial function of the Government, and I would wish to see the tenure of office made as secure as possible. Indeed, it was in my thought to suggest that the removal of one of these commissioners, and also of one of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is now exercising such great powers and discharging such responsible duties, ought to be made only by impeachment in the manner in which we would remove a judge from office. It is in order that these men should be lifted above politics and put upon a high plane. The appointment itself contains the element of political selection, but I make no suggestion about changing that. I refer simply to what will make the men in office more secure, more independent in their action and conduct, and to that end they ought to be removed from office only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this same provision is the law in reference to the removal of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that they are removed by the President in exactly the same language as provided in this bill?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I am perfectly aware of the fact.

Mr. BARKLEY. Can the gentleman recall any provision of law where any appointive officer whose appointment must be confirmed by the Senate also is removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not by the President direct; and if that is true, why should exception be made in regard to the members of this commission?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I recognize that the language of this bill is copied from the act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I also recognize that when the Interstate Commerce Commission was created this sort of legislation was in its infancy and that there is room for improvement in all such provisions. So far as merely appointive officers are concerned occupying positions in the executive departments of the Government and their removal may be concerned it ought to be within the power of the Executive to remove them, and so far as such officials come within his domain I would make no objection, but we are creating something now that lies outside the Executive and more nearly approaches the judicial. We are creating an organization that in the discharge of its duties will exercise functions as high and as great as any ever exercised by judges upon the bench and the tenure of their office ought to be made as secure as possible, and this small amendment would help to create confidence in the independence and endurance of the commission.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any doubt as to the constitutionality as to that kind of provision involved in his amendment limiting the President in the removal?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If the limitation were connected with officials absolutely in the executive departments of the Government, there might be a question as to the constitutionality of such a provision, but this commission is not connected with the executive department, but made and declared to be absolutely independent of the power and control of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COVINGTON. I want to say a single word in reply——

Mr. ADAMSON. It was understood that five minutes was to be divided up by the gentleman from Illinois and——

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not agree to an extension and let the gentleman from Maryland have more time?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I gracefully yield my time to the gentleman who is the chairman of the subcommittee on this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only reason I stated this was because we consented to apportion five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Let the gentleman from Maryland take the time; he has some information, and I want to ask some questions while he does that.

Mr. MURDOCK. If nobody will take the gentleman's time, I will.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CARAWAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5289) to provide for warning signals for vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

H. R. 12806. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside, and appropriating certain money.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4741. An act for the protection of the water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, Utah.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say to the committee I recognize the great legal ability of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who, nearly 25 years ago, taught me a good deal of what little law I know.

I always listen with a great deal of pleasure to what he has to say on a legal proposition. I think, however, he will, upon reflection, recognize that he is mistaken, and that we can not circumscribe the constitutional right of the President to remove for cause, such as malfeasance in office and otherwise, those statutory officers of the United States created merely by act of Congress. Moreover, the 27 years of experience of the public with the Interstate Commerce Commission has demonstrated that that body, beyond the control of the President, has always had a personnel of such character that there has been no necessity for a single removal from office.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Maryland forget that President Wilson has appointed a majority of the present Interstate Commerce Commission? Has he not done so?

Mr. COVINGTON. I believe he has, through the unusual accidents of vacancies.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Maryland yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I surrendered my time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition, if there is any time left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] both addressed the Chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] had the time and yielded to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON].

Mr. MURDOCK. How much time is there left?

The CHAIRMAN. There are two minutes remaining.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, in those two minutes, if I may have the floor——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] wants to use the two minutes, I think they belong to him.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think so, too.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to be courteous to all the gentlemen, and certainly if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] wants the time, I will be glad to let him have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], and I want my two minutes in full. I wish to reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] who preceded me and who criticized one of my bills.

He failed to state to the House that every power that is given the commission under my bills is subject to the review of the court. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a doleful sound from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] this afternoon, and it is a voice from the past. It was from such men as he that we had in this House for years and years obstruction to giving full power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was from such gentlemen as he, from Iowa and other States, where the political proclivities are sometimes along the straddling line—it was from such gentlemen as he that we heard for years the dismal declaration that we were encroaching upon the powers of the courts. It was such gentlemen as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], always standing in the way of public advancement and progress, who kept this country back for years from a remedy against discriminative freight rates. And it is from such gentlemen as the gentleman from Iowa, who never takes part except for desultory interruptions here, usually out of order, and not in point—it is from such gentlemen as the gentleman from Iowa that we will continue to have obstruction in giving a trade commission adequate power to handle monopoly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All of the expenses of the commission, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the commissioners, or by their employees under their orders, in making any investigation, or upon official business in any other places than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the commission.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to say a word or two to the leader of the Assistant Democratic Party in this House.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Under the five-minute rule and under your procedure here the gentleman must talk to the subject matter contained in this section. There is too much of getting away from the five-minute rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not intend to say a word about the Democratic Party.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will let the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] proceed.

Mr. DONOVAN. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was unable to determine the tenor of the gentleman's remark.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will frankly say here and now that I shall not speak to the bill, but I hope there will be no objection. I did not discuss anything personal when I was talking here before. I referred simply to a bill before the House. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] in reply saw fit to attack my record.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman has no record that I ever read about.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is merely a flippant remark, characteristic of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will withdraw his point of order and let me have the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has the floor.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Kansas talks about my record he is talking about something concerning which he has no information. I was a progressive before the gentleman from Kansas ever thought of being a progressive. I was a progressive in the times when it meant something to be a progressive and under circumstances when the movement was not popular. I did not wait for public sentiment to become a progressive.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I will not yield.

I have not succeeded, as the gentleman from Kansas has, in capitalizing my patriotism and my progressivism at the rate of $150 a lecture upon the Chautauqua platform, and I do not ever expect to have to do that. In that respect I am behind the gentleman from Kansas and will probably stay there.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I will not yield. I have followed those great leaders CUMMINS and LA FOLLETTE in the days of darkness and despair, when they went down to defeat year after year after grueling campaigns that have taken years from the life of both of them, and I am ready to follow them still, within the Republican Party, which has given us the best antitrust law ever enacted in any country, while the gentleman from Kansas has gone off after false gods, like the theories embodied in his bill, for the sake of what he thought at the time would effect a political triumph, but which will never be approved by the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I know what progressive principles are just as well as does the gentleman from Kansas. I belong to that element of the party. I am proud of it, and I do not propose that any gentleman shall stand up here in the House and say that I belong to any element that is trying to obstruct or fetter or prevent legislation against monopolies or trusts. I belonged to that element of the party when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] was in small clothes, and I tried to get these measures introduced and passed, and I forwarded them to the best of my ability and power. The gentleman gets up here in his usual style and for the sake of some political purpose or object undertakes to detract from the reputation and the record of gentlemen whom he knows nothing about. He is assuming and arrogating to himself something to which he has no right and something which he can not in justice perform.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, is any time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. MURDOCK. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to speak politically, but the political and personal record of these two gentlemen is not material to the pending bill at all. I want them to quit talking politics. I say to the gentleman from the depths of my heart and with tears in my eyes as big as horse apples that watermelons will be ripe in six weeks, and if we keep on talking here about the records of these two gentlemen it will be Christmas before we get home. [Laughter.]

I will withdraw my objection, Mr. Chairman, in the hope that in this instance the gentleman may mention the bill a time or two in his remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in my anxiety over and appetite for watermelons, and I am just as eager to reach that season of the year as any other gentleman is. But I want to reply to the gentleman from Iowa in the next five minutes.

He says that I have attacked him. The fact is that the gentleman from Iowa has just discovered that he barked up the wrong tree. The gentleman from Iowa attacked very flippantly and frivolously and without any real insight into the measure some provisions in the bill that I introduced, and then rises after I have defended my bill and says I have attacked his record.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I do not yield now.

The gentleman from Iowa asserted that he is a progressive. What sort of a progressive is he? He is one of those progressives who dares occasionally to think that he is progressive, but who stays mighty close to the skirts of the old conservative Republican Party. He does not get out very far from her protection. That is susceptible of absolute proof.

There are three parties in this country. The Democratic Party is the traditional conservative party. It now brings before the country a set of trust bills in complete keeping with its traditions—conservative bills, adding a little to an already existing statute. The Progressive Party—which is a truly progressive party—has brought before the committee of the House bills which are not conservative, which take the forward step, just as the step was taken in former years in regard to the strengthening and enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, what does the old Republican Party do, the party to which the gentleman from Iowa aligns himself as a progressive? What does it do? Every man within the sound of my voice knows what it does in this crisis. It does absolutely nothing.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. MURDOCK. No. You can speak in your own time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman deliberately wish to make a misstatement?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas——

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman listen? In the Judiciary Committee——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that we proceed with the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, my five minutes are not up. I am talking to the bill. In the Judiciary Committee what did the Republicans propose as an alternative to the Clayton bill? What did they propose? There are three separate and distinct Republican reports out of that committee. First is the one signed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and Mr. DANFORTH and Mr. DYER, and another report, signed by Mr. VOLSTEAD and Mr. NELSON, and still another, filed by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma.

Now, this situation is characteristic of the three parties. The Democratic Party within its lights—and Heaven knows its lights are limited enough—is trying to make a little feeble step in advance of the old conditions. The Progressive Party wants to make a full stride out in front and definitely get somewhere on this problem. The Republican Party, as usual, is divided in council and in opinion, and is taking the negative position, serving as a sort of basket trap to catch people who are dissatisfied with the Democratic Party.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] calls himself a progressive. As between the Democratic Party, which is really trying to move, and as between the Republican Party, which is standing pat and standing still, and the Progressive Party, which has just put before the country a comprehensive, constructive plan for the destruction of monopoly, the gentleman from Iowa continues, as he always will, to stand still with the standpatters. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there is nothing but a pro forma amendment suggested here, I ask that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to this section, and I trust the gentleman will withhold his request.

Mr. ADAMSON. That does not cut out the gentleman at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should limit this discussion in this way.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I want three minutes in which to correct the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]; to make a correction that he would not permit me to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, at the end of line 9, by adding the following: "That the commission is hereby authorized and directed to offer and pay rewards to the person or persons who shall first furnish to the Government information which shall lead to the detection of violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and of the acts supplementary thereto, and which shall result in recovery of moneys or property as fines, penalties, forfeitures, or otherwise, to the amount of 10 per cent of the amount recovered.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. I do not wish to cut the gentleman off from discussing it, but it is not germane to this section at all. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is germane to the section; and if it is not, I would like to have that question settled. I am not here to take up one minute of the time of this House on this question for the purpose of show, or for any other purpose except to discharge my duty. If the gentleman desires to make the point of order against the amendment, I trust he will do it now.

Mr. COVINGTON. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to this section. This deals entirely with administrative features.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois on the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the part of the section to which my amendment applies deals directly with the fees of witnesses, and this amendment is nothing more nor less than an enlargement of the fees of the witnesses who shall bring evidence leading to the conviction of men who have violated the very law which this commission is empowered to deal with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is broader than the gentleman from Illinois suggests.

Mr. FOWLER. The amendment only deals with the same question. While it gives a larger fee than is given by that part of the section to which it applies, yet it deals with the very same subject matter, and certainly is germane to that part of the section, if not to the other part.

This is a bill creating new law, and I can not understand why it is not germane when it deals with the very point that that part of the section deals with. If the Chair is of the opinion that it is not germane as an amendment to this section, I will offer it as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained to adhere to his original impression that at this point the amendment is not germane.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I offer it as a new paragraph.

Mr. COVINGTON. I do not contend that there may not be parts of this bill conferring express powers upon the commission in relation to investigation, or in relation to the taking of testimony, to which this amendment might not be germane; but the section that is now under consideration deals entirely with the compensation to be paid to the commissioners and the various employees and the witnesses, and it has nothing to do with the administrative powers of the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the amendment would apply more properly to a later provision in the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I have thought that it would apply to other sections, but it can be offered at any time and placed wherever it may be thought to be most proper.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to offer the amendment and have it passed on, and that it may be offered to a section where it is germane. There are several sections to come where it will be germane. The gentleman tells me he wishes to get through with it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois is to have 5 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] 5 minutes——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not care for 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I meant to say five minutes each, which was the agreement.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not understand that there is any limitation. This is the only portion of this bill upon which I expect to speak, and I desire to have an opportunity, so that the question may be discussed by other gentlemen who desire to discuss it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not make the limitation. The rules of the House make the limitation under the five-minute rule. I ask unanimous consent that when the gentleman has spoken and been replied to debate on this section close.

Mr. FOWLER. I trust that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia will withhold his request at the present time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will withdraw it, but I notify the gentleman that I do not intend to consent to anybody speaking over five minutes. I will not do it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has the floor.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion makes provisions for an Interstate Trade Commission consisting of three commissioners, and clothes them with certain powers and duties, chief among which is to investigate violations of the antitrust acts and report their findings to the President and Congress, with a view of bringing to justice the offending parties and for new legislation, if such should be found to be necessary for the adequate protection of the rights of the people. To properly discharge this important duty this commission will be compelled to rely upon evidence furnished in support of violations of antitrust laws.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment is in aid of this part of the duty of the commission. It is intended to make the evidence more certain and more easily reached. The virtue of a criminal statute does not necessarily lie in the severity of the punishment, but it does depend largely upon the certainty of the enforcement of such statute. A criminal law without enforcement is a dead letter and a burden upon the statute and the State. If this bill when enacted into law is worth anything to the people in the way of relief, it will be found in the certainty of its power to secure convicting evidence of violations of the Federal Criminal Code by gigantic conspiracies against the welfare of this Republic. My amendment will be a great weapon in the hands of the commission in detecting such violations of the law and bringing the criminals to certain justice. If I am not mistaken in the merits of the amendment, then it is most friendly to this bill and should command the respect and support of every Member of this House.

One of the greatest obstacles in the way of prosecuting the powerful combinations is the immense power possessed by them over the persons who are able to furnish the evidence. Usually such witnesses are or have been in the employ of the trusts and through this means have gained personal knowledge of violations of the law, yet they are afraid of losing their jobs, and timidly halt and hesitate to go before courts of justice and divulge the evidence. Often they are afraid of the vast power of these unlawful combinations to injure them in person or in their chances to earn a living for themselves and families. Such witnesses can not be produced unless the Government will throw its strong arms of protection around them and guard them from the vengeance of the combined monopolistic power of men whose hearts are bent on evil and greed.

Mr. Chairman, there is something materially wrong in a country where those who do the most have the least, where industry is clothed in rags and idleness is wrapped in robes, where truth remains silent through fear and falsehood stalks in authority, where wail and want haunt the hovels of the industrious many, while the fruits of their labor are poured into the laps of the idle few. Mr. Chairman, there is something wrong with the school where the teacher whips the little boys unmercifully and permits the big boys to do as they please. There is something wrong with the courts of a country where long terms of imprisonment are speedily imposed upon those who are forced by the pangs of hunger to take a loaf of bread or a roll of sausage from the restaurant through its unguarded broken window pane and at the same time fails to punish the idle rich who violate the law with impunity by robbing the people of untold millions annually. No nation can prosper under such conditions. Discontent and distrust among the many will soon breed opposition to such administration of government and plot its overthrow. Justice demands a speedy punishment of big criminals and the most certain and speedy means of obtaining convicting evidence. My amendment offers such a remedy. Will you accept it, or will you permit the evidence still to hide in the shadow of fear and intimidation, thereby delaying justice in its effort to punish and check colossal crimes?

If you pass this amendment, it will give vitality to this bill and make it a powerful instrument when enacted into law in regulating the business affairs of the Nation. I submit that we have plenty of precedents for the passage of this amendment. I offer the following statutes upon this subject:

REWARDS.

Sections 191 and 710 provided for rewards, as follows:

And whenever any person not an officer of the United States shall furnish to a district attorney, or any chief officer of customs, original information concerning any fraud upon the customs revenue, perpetrated or contemplated, which shall lead to the recovery of any duties withheld, or of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred, whether by importers or their agents, by any officer or person employed in the customs service, such compensation may on such recovery be paid to such person so furnishing information as shall be just and reasonable, not to exceed in any one case $5,000.

Section 3463, act of March, 1867, contained the following provisions for rewards:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to pay such sums, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum appropriated therefor, as he may deem necessary for the detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws, or conniving at the same, in cases where such expenses are not otherwise provided for by law.

Upheld in 1876 in Williams v. United States (12 Ct. Cls., 192).

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

(Act of June 22, 1874.)

SEC. 4. That whenever any officer of the customs or other person shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise in the act of being smuggled, or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled to such compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Treasury shall award, not exceeding in amount one-half of the net proceeds, if any, resulting from such seizure, after deducting all duties, costs, and charges connected therewith. * * *

The following provision is carried in sundry civil bill of June 28, 1902:

For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws, or conniving at the same, including payment for information and detection of such violations * * * dollars.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a vicious amendment. It is not armed with teeth and brimstone, but it is in harmony with the practices of the past. We have seen that both the internal-revenue law and the customs-revenue law have provisions for rewards. It was through the reward provision in the customs-revenue law that the Government was able to reach the mighty Sugar Trust, and recovered $2 000,000 on a settlement; and Mr. Parr, the gentleman who furnished that evidence, received his reward. It is a custom in all States of this Union when crime has been committed and the criminal hides so that he can not be detected, or so that his offense can not be properly brought to light by the authorities, to offer rewards in order to bring him to justice. The governors of the States invariably offer rewards in such instances. When crimes have been committed the counties invariably offer rewards for the apprehension and detection of the criminals. This is not an innovation; it is not a departure from the custom heretofore practiced by counties, by States, and by this Nation, but it is in harmony therewith. The first President of the United States was confronted with the very same condition that we are confronted with in hunting up evidence to bring to justice the violators of the antitrust law, and he said in reference to this question in 1776:

It gives me sincere pleasure to find that the Assembly of Pennsylvania is so well disposed to second your endeavors in bringing those murderers of our cause (the monopolists) to condign punishment.

It is much to be lamented that each State long ere this has not hunted them down as pests of society and the greatest enemies we have to the happiness of America.

I would to God that some of the most atrocious in each State were hung in gibbets upon a gallows five times as high as the one prepared by Haman.

No punishment, in my opinion, is too great for the man who builds his greatness upon his country's ruin.

This language has been quoted by many able writers and speakers upon this question, and it has never been more appropriate in the history of America than it is to-day, because the evidence leading to the conviction of those who have violated the antitrust law is in the mind and in the breast of men who are under the influence of the corporate wealth of this country, under the influence of the very men who have committed the offense against the country, and if we offer the reward it will be a security to them that they may be free to come to this commission and divulge the proper evidence for conviction. Senator KERN, the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate, has introduced a bill, which I hold in my hand, embodying the very same principles, and the part which I have offered as an amendment to this bill is literally copied from Senator KERN's bill which he introduced in the Senate on March 28, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that privilege under the rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; the gentleman has that privilege under the rule, and it is also granted for five legislative days to all without their being recognized.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does that apply to the five-minute rule?

Mr. ADAMSON. To everything.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], and I know that he desires to have this bill passed in the best condition possible, and to grant to this commission the authority necessary to perform its functions to the best advantage of the American people. His amendment is not in accord with the theory or object of the bill. This provision properly should be under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. If there is anything which will injure the trade commission, which will impair its influence, and possibly bring ruin to its great mission, it will be to have it regarded throughout the country as a detective bureau. The best information it can secure for the benefit of Congress and for the best interests of all classes of people and business of this country is that which will come voluntarily, without compulsion; and if it be understood that it will perform or must assume the functions of a detective bureau, naturally it will have that sort of a badge or label and that sort of a reputation if we adopt this amendment. Good and reputable men can not afford to be connected with it or help it. Their motives and actions would be under suspicion of petty gain or graft, and they might be classed with the informers. Such a condition and sentiment would injure the purpose and diminish the benefits of the commission more than could be done by any other single amendment. I think such a provision ought to be adopted or exist in the right kind of a measure, but it should be put where it belongs, as a part of the functions of the Department of Justice. I think the department now has funds for a somewhat similar purpose, and if the authority is not broad enough it should be strengthened by appropriate action of Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Justice has funds appropriated every year in the sundry civil appropriation bill for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; that has been done for 10 or 12 years. I think there are several funds which may be used for such purposes. One is the general lump appropriation containing the proviso exempting from its operation the farmers' and labor organizations.

But I wish now to pursue another branch of the subject, and to make a correction in the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], for I know that he does not desire to make an incorrect statement or to place in the RECORD here as facts statements which are not sustained by the record itself. The Progressive Party, represented by him, and under his leadership, has introduced one set of bills, unless he will assume paternity and responsibility for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY]. I presume originally he would have been willing to do that, but it may be that the events of the last few weeks will make him now willing that we should divide that responsibility with him. [Laughter.] We have no desire, however, to extend our authority any further than is necessary, I assure him. The fact is that this bill as it stands before the House is based principally on Republican measures introduced in past or present Congresses. I hold in my hand a report of the last Congress on the subject of a trade commission, by Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa. That report contains more of value which has been used by this committee than any other one document. It is one of the clearest and ablest presentations of the general aspects of this important subject which has been before us. I hold here a bill introduced in that Congress by Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa, on the same subject, creating a trade commission, and the committee will notice from the marginal notations upon it that more was taken out of that bill than any other one measure which this committee used. I hold here another very able and comprehensive bill, introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], whose Republicanism can not be questioned. We found some valuable and well-considered and well-drafted provisions in his bill which we used with profit.

There is another bill by Representative MARTIN, of South Dakota, and another, along the same lines, by Representative ROBERTS, of Massachusetts, which we considered.

I think four times as many Republicans as Progressives have introduced bills of this character in this same Congress. I know the gentleman from Kansas did not know anything about that fact, but the records of our committee show that these are the facts, and I am glad to bring the credit of these facts before the House. We have already and many times pointed out in our minority report and in our remarks that our Republican platform indicates about the line of this measure, and we had the mandate of our party platform in mind in our formulation and support of it. It follows the recommendation of President Taft in his message, I think, in 1912. It followed, in part, the recommendations of Attorney General Wickersham as to some of the most valuable provisions contained in this bill.

Our Democratic colleagues were informed of these facts, and freely conceded the credit of all of them. They realized that the way had been blazed by the practical statesmanship of the Republican leaders, and that the safest and best line of action now would be to do about what the Republicans would have done had the responsibility at this time been cast upon us. The Republicans always try to be genuinely constructive, and regard conditions as they are, and seek a practical remedy for conceded evils which will really aid in curing them without causing a vastly greater distress by causing chaos and disaster, which would certainly follow the enactment of such a measure as proposed by the gentleman from Kansas. There is nothing startling or sensational about our measure, but it will stand the test of practical experience. So I think that the Republicans have a right, and they have assumed this right which has been freely granted by our Democratic brethren, to do the best we can to assist them in preparing a bill which shall be of real benefit to the country along the line of Republican leadership and the Republican platform. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the views expressed by the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for one moment? I desire to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is not in the nature of a detective provision, and it does not bear any of the earmarks of such a provision, in my opinion. The principle involved in it is as old as the common law. In nearly every State in the Union I think the State provides for what are called qui tam actions, whereby, if certain laws are violated, anyone who knows of the violation can prosecute and can recover a certain per cent of the amount given in judgment against the offender. That is the principle involved in this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and it is sound and it is wise. I think the principle is not only sound, but I think the policy involved in it is a very wise policy. There have been in the past, I believe, serious violations of the antitrust law. There are many instances of contracts with the Government where those contracts have been willfully and materially violated; where frauds, in my judgment, have been perpetrated upon the Government; and this is just as good a place as any where a provision may be inserted in the law covering these fraudulent violations by contracting parties with the Government of the United States.

Now, the question before us at this time is that if this amendment be agreed to, if this provision be approved, it will be inserted in the bill at any point where it will fit. As my colleague has said, the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate has approved of it by introducing a bill from which this amendment is taken. If it is not adopted now, the chances of its immediate adoption are not very bright, and it is very clear that such a provision as this ought to be inserted at this time, so that it may become the law of the land as soon as practicable, and that an impetus may be given to those who have knowledge of such facts to produce them. It is said that this commission is not the proper tribunal before which to bring such complaints, but this body is at least quasi judicial and probably will have as much time as a court to hear complaints of this character and pass upon them. I sincerely trust, Mr. Chairman, that this provision will be approved of by the committee at this time and incorporated into this bill at a point where it will fit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The information obtained by the commission in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon it by this section may be made public, in the discretion of the commission.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Maryland a question. This is the section which provides for taking over by the commission of the Bureau of Corporations. Now, the Bureau of Corporations in years past has investigated several of the larger corporations—the Beef Trust, the oil industry, the Harvester Trust, and so forth—and a portion of that information which they collated was published, but there must have been a world of it which was not published, for various reasons. Now, is that information in existence in that bureau?

Mr. COVINGTON. I can not state whether all the information that was unpublished in those three great investigations is actually in existence, but I will say that in order to preserve and transfer to the possession of the commission all papers that are now in existence we have provided very careful phraseology near the top of page 4, that all records, papers, and documents now in existence in the Bureau of Corporations shall be transferred to and become the property of the commission.

Mr. MURDOCK. So those would go over?

Mr. COVINGTON. Those would go over.

Mr. MURDOCK. Another question. In the early part of the history of the Bureau of Corporations a very strong recommendation was made for a law creating a Federal license, which the gentleman from Maryland will remember, to be administered by this Bureau of Corporations.

Now, if in the future such a law is passed, and in all probability it will some time become law, would that naturally, then, put the administration of that law in this new commission?

Mr. COVINGTON. That would depend entirely——

Mr. MURDOCK. Upon the law itself?

Mr. COVINGTON. But, unquestionably, if there were a scheme for Federal incorporation carried out upon the plan recommended by Commissioner Garfield, for he was the Commissioner of Corporations who made that recommendation, it would almost of necessity vest in the Interstate Trade Commission the administration of the plan. I do not think that I quite agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], however, in his statement that Federal incorporation is almost a certainty in the very near future. To my mind it is yet a long way off.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of obtaining information. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON]. I wish to ask him what added powers, other than those which are conferred in other sections of the bill, are transferred to the commission, other than those now possessed by the Bureau of Corporations, by this section?

What are those powers which they would otherwise have if no powers were transferred by this section? In this connection, as the gentleman knows, all the powers they now have are under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce. Now, the Secretary of Commerce being deprived of his directory power, what powers would be transferred which are not incorporated in other sections of this bill?

Mr. COVINGTON. The answer to that is that, after a very careful examination of the statute and the peculiar phraseology of it, creating the Bureau of Corporations and the Commissioner of Corporations, the committee came unanimously to the conclusion that the powers, and the duties as well, of both the Bureau of Corporations and the Commissioner of Corporations—for that is the language used—were not dependent upon the direction of the Secretary of Commerce; but the manner of the exercise of those powers was dependent upon his direction, the powers and duties inhering in the bureau and in the commissioner. Consequently they were such that they could be vested in the commission and made exercisable by it independently of the Secretary of Commerce, just as though an act of Congress had repealed that clause directing them to be exercised by the Secretary of Commerce, and which would leave the powers in their full vigor, to be exercised independently by the Bureau and by the Commissioner of Corporations.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is not this what the gentleman from Wisconsin desires? I read from the act creating the Bureau of Corporations, which power is not contained in any other provision of the bill and is probably the most important so far as the general business world is concerned of anything in the measure. It says:

It shall also be the province and duty of said bureau to gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning corporations doing business within the limits of the United States as shall engage in interstate commerce or any commerce between the United States and any foreign country, including corporations engaged in insurance, and to attend to such other duties as may be hereafter provided by law.

The effect of that as construed is and will be, as we hope, that the general mass of information that the men of this country desire will be gathered under that provision and may be published under that provision. If any of them desire information as to its business, that information will be furnished under this provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. That power will be transferred to the new commission which is not specifically in other sections of the bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This is not incorporated in any other part of the bill, and that is one of the most useful functions of the commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. In that connection I wish to ask another question. Although you make a transfer of all clerks and employees now employed at the bureau by this section, is there any provision for the transfer of the deputy commissioner?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will state that that office has been abolished entirely.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, some question was asked as to what became of the record of the investigation by the Bureau of Corporations——

Mr. MURDOCK. I asked that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have seen it stated in the press and heard it stated that the records of the Harvester Trust investigation, when it was suggested that the Senate was about to make an investigation, were taken from the office of the Bureau of Corporations and carried to the White House by a former President of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I presume they are still intact in possession of that former President or some person in behalf of the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT. I never heard of them being returned by the President.

Mr. COVINGTON. I think they may be at Oyster Bay.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I think they may be at Oyster Bay.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Or they may be floating on the current of the unknown river.

Mr. BARKLEY. He may have dropped them down in that new river which he discovered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 20, after the word "this," strike out the word "section" and insert the following: "act shall be furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to all railroad or corporation commissions of the several States and Territories," so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"The information obtained by the commission in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon it by this act shall be furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to all railroad or corporation commissions of the several States and Territories, and may be made public, in the discretion of the commission."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let the Clerk indicate how the provision will read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

So that the amendment will read: "The information obtained by the commission in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon it by this section shall be furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to all railroad or corporation commissions of the several States and Territories, and may be made public, in the discretion of the commission."

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma rose.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question, suggested by his amendment, before he begins?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understood it, ought not the amendment to read, "Upon request"? It was the intention that this information should be furnished upon request to such commission?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I think I would have answered that if the question had not been asked.

Mr. TOWNER. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to furnish an instrument of "information and publicity" as a "clearing house" for facts by which the public mind and the managers of business interests shall be guided, so runs the committee report. It is suggested, further, with a view to aiding the courts.

There are two ways by which this information may serve the public. One is, as suggested in the bill, to procure a basis upon which the President may predicate a recommendation to Congress, or upon which Congress may enact legislation. Another is in the matter of regulating such corporations as are under the control of the different branches of the Government.

Now, I call the attention of the committee to this fact: You can go to the Treasury Department and get the names of the stockholders of the banks of the country. You can go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and get certain information with reference to the railroads. You can not go anywhere and get official information concerning the operation of the Standard Oil Corporation or its allied concerns. You ought to have official information of the output every day, of the raw product, of the refined product, of the demand of the country for oil, so that in a given section or field we may know to a certainty whether or not there is an overproduction, as is claimed by the Standard Oil interests whenever it seeks to control the independent operator.

In our State the railroad and corporation commission has a power that no other like body possesses, because it has legislative and judicial powers as well as executive powers. No other body on this continent possesses such powers. They can get information where it relates to intrastate, but not where it relates to interstate, commerce or business. The Interstate Commerce Commission itself can not get full and complete information under the powers that Congress has granted to it. More than once have they sent their representatives to Oklahoma to get information with reference to railroads in that State.

Now, a corporation commission like ours, that may regulate all public-service corporations or quasi public-service corporations, or any other institutions wherein a trust appears, including grain separators and cotton gins, as well as electric lights, railroads, and things of that sort, ought to have such information as it is not now able to obtain. Certainly the purpose of this commission is to procure information and to secure evidence, and if that evidence is not forthcoming to the different commissions of the country in the various States which could not, as you will readily understand, get hold of it, then it would be of very little benefit. I do not believe for a moment that this House or that this committee would object to the requirement of furnishing such information to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the various railroad commissions of the States. They, of course, will not ask it except in cases where it concerns things under their charge and control, leaving the other matters to be "published in the discretion of the commission."

I call attention to the fact also that if you get partial information by this bill and do not get all you can not predicate upon it sound legislation, nor can the President, upon it as a basis, make a proper recommendation as to legislation; and you may rest assured that these corporations will not give you any information except that which they want to give you, unless you compel them to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Well, Mr. Chairman, I heard the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] say he was going to object to granting any further time, and so I will not proceed.

Mr. COVINGTON. I did not say that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will not ask for more time. I love him so well that he will take less offense if I decline to give him more time than anybody else would in the House.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the committee stand 10 minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I will not insist on it now, but will ask for time in a few moments on another amendment that is more important than this.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I want the committee to understand that I appreciate the purpose of the gentleman from Oklahoma in offering this amendment; but it just shows how even in a bill as technically framed as this, and as carefully constructed as this, the offering of a chance amendment prepared outside may destroy the very purposes or purpose that this bill seeks to effectuate.

This amendment is offered to the section which transfers the powers of the Bureau of Corporations to the interstate trade commission. One of the most serious objections to that bureau at the time it was created, in the administration of the then President Roosevelt, was that he was able, through the statute then written, to hold in the hollow of his hand and use at his imperious will the information gathered by the investigations conducted under it; and one of the motives of this committee in transferring these powers in the way that they are transferred was to provide that the information obtained should be made public under this section at the discretion of the commission. If we strike out the words in this section and insert the words "shall be furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to all railroads or corporation commissions" the effect will be to eliminate entirely that provision which makes this publicity a real, independent publicity, and will restore to the control of the President entirely the publicity obtained under that section.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do not change the power of publicity provided here, and I would not ask that all this information be published. I realize that for business reasons certain information ought not to be published, but when it relates to those peculiar things under the control of the State corporations of the different States, they ought to have the right to that information, and the gentleman understands how difficult it is to get it without making it compulsory.

Mr. COVINGTON. I think the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] will appreciate that if there is merit in his proposition he has offered it to the wrong section. This section does not pretend to do anything except to transfer the powers now existing in the Bureau of Corporations to this independent commission. It does not relate to the investigations that may be conducted under the other sections. It does not relate to the information which may be elicited by virtue of the independent requirements for annual and special reports which we provide shall inhere in this commission, but it relates entirely to the removing from the control of the Executive the power that he now has over the information gathered by the Bureau of Corporations. The commission itself is given complete control of the publicity of that information, and if the gentleman's amendment prevails the result will be simply to make the commission subordinate to the President in matters of publicity, as the Bureau of Corporations now is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That, with the exception of the secretary and a clerk to each commissioner, all employees of the commission shall be a part of the classified civil service, and shall enter the service under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the commission and by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is perhaps generally admitted that it will be necessary to appoint attorneys to assist the commission, will it not?

Mr. COVINGTON. Unquestionably.

Mr. TOWNER. I think you would hardly expect those attorneys to be under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. COVINGTON. I think if the gentleman will examine the second paragraph of section 8 of the bill he will find that there is an express provision, in very much the same language as that contained in the act to regulate commerce, whereby necessary special attorneys and experts are authorized to be employed, just as we have special attorneys and agents of the Interstate Commerce Commission, entirely outside of the classified service.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the words defined in this section shall have the following meaning when found in this act, to wit:

"Commerce" means such commerce as Congress has the power to regulate under the Constitution.

"Corporation" means a body incorporated under law, and also joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock or organized to carry on business with a view to profit.

"Capital" means the stocks and bonds issued and the surplus owned by a corporation.

"Antitrust acts" means the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; also the sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved August 27, 1894; and also the act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,'" approved February 12, 1913.

"Acts to regulate commerce" means the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 14, 1887, and all amendments thereto.

"Documentary evidence" means all documents, papers, and correspondence in existence at and after the passage of this act.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 14, after the word "Constitution," strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following: "excepting commerce subject to the act to regulate commerce."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in charge of the bill will remember that when he was addressing the House the other day I called his attention to this definition of "commerce." The word "commerce" is used in various parts of the bill, and under this broad definition it would include all transportation companies and railways.

I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that section 9 contains these words:

Every corporation engaged in commerce, excepting corporations subject to the act to regulate commerce.

There is the limitation that ought to be in this definition of "commerce." As the gentleman will remember, there are other provisions of the bill that refer to the word "commerce." Unless the word "commerce," as it is used here, is given the same limitation as is given in section 9, I think there will be confusion in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it ought to be in section 9.

Mr. COVINGTON. I am glad to have the interruption of the gentleman from Iowa. As I stated fully in my speech presenting this bill to the House on Tuesday last, there is but a single section in this bill, and that is section 10, where the commission is given power, except by direction of the courts, to make any inquiry into the affairs of corporations subject to the act to regulate commerce.

In the exercise of the powers under section 10 it is emphatically not intended to limit the operations of the commission to corporations not subject to the act to regulate commerce. It is intended to include all corporations. Common carriers connected with and so related to industrial corporations, great plants along their lines, as practically to constitute a unit in a combination are clearly within the purview of the existing antitrust law. That sort of a combination in restraint of trade may need a thorough investigation; and if the interstate trade commission is not to be permitted, in making such an investigation, to cross the line of the industry and go into the books of the common carrier to the extent of discovering whether the antitrust laws are actually being violated by it, the investigation under section 10 would be often fruitless. I think the gentleman will find, therefore, that the amendment he suggests is both unwise and unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Page 5, line 17, strike out the word "or" following the word "stock."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think that word "or" must have been used inadvertently. It certainly should be used only, not in the disjunctive, but as directly connected with that which precedes it. The intended meaning is that all organizations having shares of capital or capital stock organized to carry on business with a view to profit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the phraseology as it now exists include partnerships or associations who carry on business with a view to profit?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; it was not the intention evidently to use the disjunctive and create another division. It was intended to further characterize the associations which have been previously described.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, that whole definition was framed advisedly after we thrashed it out pretty thoroughly. Under some of the varied laws that exist in the States limited copartnerships and associations of various kinds, having limited liabilities of the same sort as corporations and practically coming within the scope of corporate responsibility, may be organized. There are at least one or two of these associations organized with a view to profit which now almost approach the status of a combination in restraint of trade. They might exist without having any capital stock at all. The gentleman will, I think, upon reflection, see that they ought to be reached by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the entire bill would have to be reconstructed if it is intended now to include partnerships within the operation of this law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARTLETT). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield for a question, but I think the gentleman from Iowa has the floor, and there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand, there is only one question which is before the House, and that is my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman desires to offer another amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. In the nature of a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yet offered his amendment, so the Chair can not tell.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. My amendment applies to another section, and I shall withhold it and ask recognition later.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in order to get the attention of the gentleman from Maryland, on page 6, line 13, I move to insert after the word "all" the word "material," so it will read:

Documentary evidence means all material documents.

And so forth.

I make the motion for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Maryland a question as to why there is not some limitation.

Mr. COVINGTON. We think the courts, after all, are the proper places to determine what documents, as well as what personal evidence, may or may not be material. The word "documents," in order to be an efficacious word, must be practically all embracing, so as to cover all documents; and whenever documents are compelled to be produced, the burden of showing that such documents which the commission, in an investigation, or in any other proceeding under this act, desires to have access to ought not to be produced, should be upon the corporation. The case may be carried to the courts, and they will protect the corporations in the unlikely event that their constitutional rights are being invaded.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The language as it now stands is so broad it gives the commission power to make any citizen bring in any documents or papers or correspondence that he controls. What I wanted to know is whether the gentleman's committee had taken that into consideration and had then formulated the language as it is printed?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not this solve the matter? Under the Constitution this commission can conduct only two lines of investigation, one that shall be in the nature of an assistance to a judicial proceeding which must be distinct and clear, and of course any document that pertains to the proceeding must be material. The other line of investigation must be an investigation in the line of legislative action, or practically that, and in order to have any effectiveness it must be followed by specific public action. Now, the investigation pursues a concrete line of inquiry on a certain concrete subject, and of course the court can only construe those words with reference to the particular thing that the commission is doing at the time and for which they require the documents, so that the amendment of the gentleman is unnecessary for the reason that the whole bill would only be constitutional on the theory that the particular investigation was judicial on the one side or legislative on the other, and that those documents must pertain at the time to the particular thing that the commission has authority to do.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And who is to determine that question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Of course that is a matter for the court.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman for a moment contend we could not make legislation here that would be constitutional to get this information for any purpose?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is very clear we could not. The Supreme Court has decided time and time again the question involving the powers of this very House. In the celebrated Kilbourn case they held that we have no right to make a dragnet investigation.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The House is different——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. There is one other question I want to suggest, and I do not care whether the gentleman from Minnesota or the gentleman from Maryland answers it. As the language reads now is it not a violation of the constitutional provision in reference to unlawful seizure?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; for the reason that the courts would construe it in connection with the particular proceeding that the commission was undertaking.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does not this commission get power first to compel its production before it can go to the court to be passed upon?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; the commission gets its authority from the law to conduct a particular proceeding either legislative or judicial. That particular proceeding is along a certain line, to which certain facts are relevant. Within that scope of relevancy these documents can be obtained, and the court would construe this language so as to come within the relevancy of the proceeding that the commission would undertake. That is all.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I simply made the motion in order to get light on this point, and while the light does not completely satisfy me, yet I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 15, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"That the powers and jurisdiction herein conferred upon the commission shall extend over all trade associations, corporate, combinations, and corporations, as hereinbefore defined, engaged in or affecting commerce, except banks and financial corporations, and such corporations as are subject to control by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, nowhere in this act is there an express statement of the classes of corporations over which it is to operate, and now since we have had the idea of the gentleman with regard to the section that I referred to a moment ago, it is more indefinite than ever. There can be nothing that will so discredit this act as indefiniteness. Now, it occurs to me that the opinion of the country is settled as to what should be the scope of the operations of this act. We have now the Interstate Commerce Commission, that has control over the transportation companies of the land. We have now established the Federal Banking Reserve System, which will have control of those matters. It is now sought to establish, and I want to aid in every possible way that I can in that laudable undertaking, a great trade commission that shall have jurisdiction over the great trade combinations and corporations of this country. It occurs to me that this bill without a declaration of what it is to operate upon is very much like the tragedy of "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet left out of it. Certainly we can not now answer, if the inquiry is made, as to what is the scope of the jurisdiction of this trade commission. I want to say to the members of the committee that this definition of what shall be the objects and purposes and the jurisdiction of this trade commission is what has already been agreed upon by the subcommittee of the Senate in defining and fixing the jurisdiction, as they do, of the trade commission, so that we shall have in advance placed ourselves in harmony with their action upon that great subject. I can conceive of no reason why this should not be done or why the definition that I have set forth there does not meet every purpose specified by those who have the passage of this bill in their desire.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. What divisions does the gentleman make as to corporations, associations, and so forth?

Mr. TOWNER. I will give the gentleman the exact language. It says:

That the powers and jurisdiction herein conferred upon the commission shall extend over all trade associations, corporate combinations, and corporations, as hereinbefore defined, engaged in or affecting commerce, except banks and financial corporations, and such corporations as are subject to control by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MURDOCK. Your exclusion then would include pipe lines?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, certainly. They are subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, the corporate combinations would include joint stock companies?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; holding companies and everything of that kind?

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. In his judgment what would be included in that phrase "financial corporations"?

Mr. TOWNER. I think those which are exclusively trust companies and business of that kind which are now under the control of the Federal Reserve Board, or will be.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the very point. Are they under such control?

Mr. TOWNER. They are not now, all of them.

Mr. WILLIS. They are not under any law. Now, would it not narrow the purpose of this law to exclude them? Would it not be desirable that they as well as the banks should come under the terms of this bill?

Mr. TOWNER. I should say emphatically no, because their supervision and control should not be committed to a Federal trade commission. It ought to go to the Federal Reserve Banking System. Financial combinations of the country should be subject to its control.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me there?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. ADAMSON. I can not allow that. I will give notice that no man can have more time than five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] objects.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] well stated the objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. It would narrow the scope of this bill. This very section, on page 5, line 15, defines what would come under the scope of the bill under the definition of "corporations." It is defined as "a body incorporated under law," and it also defines and describes "joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock or organized to carry on business with a view to profit." That includes all sorts of corporations and organizations—copartnerships and all.

Now, the principal section of the bill giving the power to investigate, to order, and to receive reports, is section 9, which reads as follows—that is, the beginning of it: "That every corporation engaged in commerce"—that is to say, every one of these legal entities just defined and described engaged in interstate or foreign commerce comes within the scope of the bill, so that it is not necessary to make any reference to the financial institutions at all. They do not come within the scope of the bill unless they engage in commerce, as described on page 5, and if they do engage in commerce they ought to come within the scope of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I will call the gentleman's attention to section 10. This section includes the investigation of the alleged violation of the antitrust act by any corporation. Now, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] should prevail, it would not be possible to have an investigation which in any way involved a financial corporation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman makes a good suggestion. If I recall rightly, the old charter of the Chemical Bank, in New York, was not based solely upon a banking privilege but upon some industrial privilege. I have no doubt that there are many financial institutions of that sort in this country which are engaged in some industrial pursuit that would come within the scope of this act. We can not, and ought not, to separate the two functions. They ought to be under the jurisdiction of this commission in order to protect the public, in order that all of their public operations should be supervised, just the same as where a railroad company engages in work outside of that of a public carrier. In that case such work ought to come within the scope of this commission for investigation. So that it is not safe now to make such a change in the phraseology, where the committee has gone over this matter so carefully, and defined the word "corporation" as carefully as we have done, and defined and measured, as we have, the authority in sections 9, 10, and 11. I very much fear the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa would restrict the power and functions of the commission.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman from Minnesota contend that the word "corporation" in section 9 covers everything in the way of a holding company?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; every corporation engaged in commerce except common carriers, and even as to them I do not know but that we include their operations outside of public carriage regulated by the interstate-commerce acts.

Mr. MURDOCK. It would cover trust companies and holding companies?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; it would cover every sort of corporation that engages in interstate commerce except common carriers.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it is now half past 5 o'clock, and under the rule it is time that the committee should rise and that the House should take a recess.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Let us have a vote, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. Under the rules of the House, under which we are considering this bill, we are to quit at not later than 5.30.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That applies only to general debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. The rule referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] covers only general debate. We are not now in general debate. However, as we have lost so much time to-day, we did hope gentlemen would be willing to run along until 6 o'clock, to see how far we can get.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point that under the rule this is the time to take a recess. This is the rule:

> During the continuance of this order of business, except on Wednesdays, the House shall meet each day at 11 o'clock a. m. And while the general debate is in progress the House shall recess at not later than 5.30 p. m., until 8 o'clock p. m., when it shall reconvene and continue in session until not later than 11 o'clock p. m.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the Chair will observe, he will notice that the recess provision applies only to general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was going to rule that this does not hold during the debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that I would like to run until 6 o'clock, if he is content.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum. The Chair can not overrule that unless there is a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make his point of no quorum. I just stated that we agreed with the gentleman from Wisconsin that we would rise at a quarter to 6 o'clock. I want to get as near 6 o'clock as we can, because we lost a lot of time to-day.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). There is no quorum present; there are 61 Members.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not understand, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Illinois insisted upon his point of order. I think I will let the roll be called. I had agreed with the gentleman from Wisconsin that we would run until a quarter to 6; but if the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, let the Clerk call the roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

During the roll call,

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who made the point of no quorum, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings under the call, and the gentleman asks to withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not agree to withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. MURDOCK. The regular order is to call this roll.

Mr. ADAMSON. I misunderstood the gentleman from Illinois. Let the roll call go on.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood that the gentleman from Georgia was going to ask unanimous consent to discontinue the further calling of the roll.

Mr. ADAMSON. I could not ask that unless the gentleman from Illinois consented to withdraw the point of no qurum. I want a vote on this amendment, and am willing then to move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the roll call.

The Clerk resumed and completed the calling of the roll.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, found itself without a quorum; whereupon he directed the roll to be called, when 195 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to the House to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask——

The SPEAKER. Under the rule nothing is in order except for the committee to resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, and other bills, and had come to no resolution thereon.

IMMIGRATION STATION IN BALTIMORE.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 12806) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation in the State of Maryland to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station, heretofore set aside, with Senate amendments thereto, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I understand these are merely formal amendments to meet the wishes of the War Department?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is the idea, and also the Department of Commerce.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, under the rule, I believe we are to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. ADAMSON. With emphasis on the 11 o'clock. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.), under the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 22, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 22, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee day by day at the beginning of our work in this National Congress in recognition of the unseen empire that lies back of all our organization and our national movements. Back of the surface of things there are forces not less potent because unseen which make for the destiny of mankind and determine finally the issues of government. We pray that our eyes may be opened with visions of the divine order that we may see Thy movement among men and understand Thy way. May we be enabled to apprehend Thy will that we may make it the rule of our own conduct, and through it bring about God's great designs for us as a people. For Christ's sake. Amen.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask unanimous consent that House bill 14385, the unfinished business, be laid before the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it would seem to be a work of supererogation that I should attempt to address the Senate on the measure which is now pending. I fully realize that nothing that I can say and, in fact, nothing that any Senator or anyone can say will change the result of the vote which is soon to be had in the Senate on this measure; but I feel that it is a duty which I owe to myself and to the section of the country which I in part represent to state the reasons for the faith that is within me.

Mr. President, I yield to none in my admiration, regard, and respect for the distinguished President of the United States. I recognize, as does everyone, his magnificent intellect, his lofty purposes, and his splendid patriotism. I thoroughly believe in the integrity of his purpose when he advocates the repeal of the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, and I am convinced that when he expresses it as his opinion that the policy involved in that particular clause of the act was unwise from an economic standpoint, and was and is a violation of our treaty with Great Britain, and asks the ungrudging support of the Congress of the United States in its repeal, that he believes sincerely and conscientiously in the truth of both his contentions. It is because of my belief in him as a man and as one of the most distinguished citizens who ever occupied the presidential chair that I feel he courts the honest opinion of those who differ from him on both positions which he has taken in his message to Congress. In what I have to say, therefore, I expressly disclaim any purpose or intention to say aught in criticism of the President's integrity of purpose or of his patriotism, but I claim the right of every citizen, and particularly of those who are called upon to discharge their high duties as members of a coordinate branch of the Government, to state my views fairly and without regard to what others may think or say or do, for I feel that if Congress yields now and repeals the portion of the act referred to at the demand of any person or any power, or because of the opinion that all the powers may have of this Government, we undermine the very foundations upon which the Republic rests. It is with me, as it is with the President, a matter of conviction and of conscience. So feeling and so believing, I shall discharge my duty as God has given me the light to see it.

I may say, too, that I have no hatred of Great Britain and I do not blame her for the insistence which she makes with reference to a division of jurisdiction, if not of responsibility, over the Panama Canal. This insistence is in line with the policy which has characterized her for centuries, and the fact that her demands have been yielded to more than once by her commercial rivals the world over has encouraged her to assert a right against the United States and over a territory owned by this Government, which, I shall attempt to prove, is without justification or excuse. Her statesmen have at all times acted for the best interest of their Government during the lifetime of their administration, but have never at any time overlooked an opportunity to lay a foundation for her future extension and development. Nobody criticizes them for this, nor shall I.

Mr. President, advocates of the bill which proposes to repeal the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act of 1912 base their contention upon one or the other or both of the following propositions: First, that the act in question is violative of the stipulations contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, entered into between this country and Great Britain November 18, 1901; second, that the exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is unwise as an economic policy.

I shall discuss these two propositions in their order in an endeavor to show that each of them is without merit and unsound.

And, first, does the act of 1912 violate the terms of any treaty in force between the two countries and is the national honor in any way involved if the act is permitted to remain as a part of the law of the country? If it can be shown that the claims of Great Britain in Central America were baseless; that they were acquired by fraud or force, or in violation of treaty rights with any other nation, and that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, was based upon claims so acquired, it seems to me that the force of this first insistence made by the advocates of repeal is impaired, because the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901, was grounded entirely upon the treaty of 1850. A stream can not rise higher than its source, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty can not purge the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of the fraud upon which the British contention is based.

ORIGIN OF GREAT BRITAIN'S CLAIMS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

Assuming that Great Britain—or if not she, her partisans in this country and in the Congress of the United States—is urging that the act of 1912 is violative of the letter and spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and reflects upon our national integrity, I deem it proper to show briefly the genesis and gradual evolution of the claim of Great Britain to certain alleged rights in Central America.

Long prior to 1763 the old English buccaneers began to prey upon the Spanish possessions at and about the Isthmus, and the first claim of Great Britain grew out of the depredations of these bold captains of the sea. The usurpations of these men and the rights claimed to have been acquired by them at Belize led to the first treaty between Great Britain and Spain, executed at Paris in 1763, under the terms of which the former agreed, in consideration of being allowed the mere right to cut logwood, to dismantle her fortifications which had been erected in any part of the territory. This treaty she ruthlessly violated, and because of her inability to retain her pretended claims in Belize she entered into another treaty in 1783, agreeing to leave the country and abandon the Isthmus, except Belize, where she was to continue to have the same right to cut logwood. The treaty provided that all the English on the Spanish continent should retire within the territory between the Belize River and the Rio Hondo, the former near the center and the latter the north boundary of what is now known as British Honduras. This treaty was executed by Great Britain with a secret reservation, as the history of the time conclusively proves, that it was later to be violated. It was not her purpose to keep it, nor did she do so when it suited her convenience to repudiate it, and it was later urged by Great Britain that the term "continent of Spain" mentioned in the treaty did not have reference to any portion of Central America, and, as in the case of the former treaty, she ignored its terms. This resulted in negotiations that found expression in another treaty, executed in 1786, in one article of which the parties agreed to observe it sincerely and with bona fides. The title of Spain to Belize was in express terms admitted, with only the permissive right of British subjects to cut logwood and mahogany. (See Parliamentary History, vol. 26, 1786–1788.) Great Britain stipulated in this, as in the former treaties, to dismantle her fortifications in her alleged possessions in Central America and to evacuate the Mosquito country.

I call the Senate's attention to the fact that the language of these treaties of Great Britain with Spain, which were constantly violated, is almost in hæc verba with the language that is used in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which she violated with us just as ruthlessly as she violated the treaties which she had with Spain. Note this, Mr. President: A resolution censuring the ministry was offered in Parliament because of the execution of this last treaty of adjustment and renunciation. Lord Chancellor Thurlow, in vindication of the ministry, delivered an address in Parliament and expressly declared that Great Britain never had any valid claim, title, or interest in any portion of the Mosquito Coast, and Mr. Pitt, in the House of Commons, introduced a bill indemnifying those Englishmen who had been induced to go into that country in violation of the terms of the two former treaties with Spain. This bill of indemnification was passed by Parliament, the resolution of censure was defeated, and the action of the ministry in executing the treaty sustained.

In his address referred to Lord Thurlow said, in substance—and I quote from the Parliamentary Register of 1787, volume 22, page 138:

> With regard to settlements, it would have been imagined by those who were strangers to the fact that there had been a regular government, a regular council, and established laws peculiar to the territory, when the fact was there neither existed one nor the other; he went into the history of the settlement, tracing it down from the year 1650 to the year 1777, mentioning Lord Godolphin's treaty and all its circumstances, and deducing arguments from each fact he mentioned to prove that the Mosquito shore never had been fairly to be deemed a British settlement, but that a detachment of soldiers had been landed from the island of Jamaica, who erected fortifications, which were afterwards by order of the Government at home abandoned and withdrawn. He instanced the transactions on the subject at the peace of Paris in 1763, when Gov. Littleton presided at Jamaica, and enlarged upon them to show that this country by the peace of Paris had renounced whatever claim she might before that period have fancied she had a right to maintain, and had given a fresh proof of her having done so in the year 1777, when Lord George Germain, the secretary for the American department, sent out Mr. Lawrie to the Mosquito shore to see that the stipulations of this country with Spain were carried fully into execution. His lordship enlarged on these particulars, and after enforcing and applying them to the arguments urged in defense of the motion proceeded to notice what the Earl of Carlisle had said on the delicacy of questions of that sort, declaring that he had been happy to hear the matter so judiciously observed upon. He should have been extremely glad if the whole grounds of the transactions could with prudence and propriety have been gone into, but as that could not be done he must meet the matter as he found it. With regard to the degradation of the country—> that the fourteenth article was pretended to hold out, he denied the fact. The Mosquitos were not our allies; they were not a people whom we were bound by treaty to protect, nor was there anything like the number of British subjects there that had been stated, the number having been, according to the last report from thence, only 120 men and 16 women. The fact was we had procured—by contract, if noble lords pleased—a stipulation that the King of Spain would not punish those British subjects and the Mosquitos who had possessed themselves improperly of the rights belonging to the Spanish Crown, and in consequence of such irregular possession had persisted for a course of time, but with frequent interruption, in the enjoyment of those rights. He repelled the argument that the settlement was a regular and legal settlement; and so far from agreeing, as had been contended, that we had uniformly remained in the quiet and unquestioned possession of our claim to the territory, he called upon the noble viscount (Stormont) to declare as a man of honor whether he did not know to the contrary.

That refers to the Mosquito country—

I have read that extract for the purpose of showing that from a British standpoint, at the time the treaty with Spain was executed, there was absolutely a disclaimer by the men who had the authority to disclaim that Great Britain ever had any title, right, or interest along the Spanish-American coast.

Other British supporters of the ministry took the same position in the matter and repudiated the suggestion that Great Britain had any just claims, by settlement or otherwise.

I call particular attention to this because I think it proves conclusively by contemporaneous English history of the highest character that in 1786 Great Britain had no valid claim of title in the Mosquito country, and that between that date and the execution of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty she never acquired or held any higher title in Central America than she had at that early date. It is true that on pretended humanitarian grounds she undertook to set up a protectorate over the Mosquito Indians along the coast, but all of her pretensions in this behalf were violative of the treaty of 1786 as well as of former treaties with Spain; and later, in the separation of the Spanish-American colonies from the mother country she undertook gradually again to extend her claims to the Mosquito Coast by taking the reputed son of a mythical Indian chief to Jamaica, crowning him as king, and again asserting rights to the country in violation of the rights of Nicaragua, within whose territory the Mosquito country then was.

What was the purpose of Great Britain in asserting these claims, as well as others at Tigris on the Pacific side of Nicaragua, if it was not to secure the commercial advantages which would accrue from holding the key to any transisthmian canal, railroad, or other connection between the two oceans? Subsequent events have proven that she had no other purpose or object in view than to acquire a strategic position and to hold it against the world in case a means of transit across the Isthmus ever should be effected. Our Government had from time to time protested that Great Britain by her course in Central America was violating the Monroe doctrine, which had become a settled policy with our people.

This was the condition of things at the conclusion of the war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and while negotiations were pending between the two Republics for the adjustment of their differences, which was finally accomplished under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, proclaimed July 4, 1848. Under the terms of that treaty Texas, Arizona, and California were ceded to the United States, and with this magnificent addition to our territory, separated as it was from the Atlantic seaboard by a then trackless wilderness, Great Britain had a stronger reason for again attempting to acquire a foothold which would give to her an advantage over the United States. To that end, within six days of the ratification of the treaty with Mexico, the governor of Jamaica sent an armed cruiser to the mouth of the San Juan River, seized the town there and named it Greytown, in honor of the governor of Jamaica; and by virtue of this illegal seizure Great Britain claimed rights on the San Juan River and at its mouth, in violation of the settled policy of the United States as declared by President Monroe in 1823.

Close upon the heels of this followed the greatest diplomatic blunder ever committed, namely, the ratification by the Senate of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was under the Democratic administration of James K. Polk that Mr. Hise, chargé of the United States at Guatemala, was sent to Nicaragua on a mission of this Government, and he—it is claimed, without authority—negotiated a treaty with that Republic, under the terms of which the United States was vested with exclusive authority, notwithstanding the pretended claims of Great Britain along the coast, to build a canal through Nicaragua connecting the two oceans, including the right to fortify the canal from one end to the other, to establish towns and free ports at either end thereof, giving to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the canal when completed. This had the merit at least of a truly American policy.

Before the return of the treaty to Washington the Democratic Party went out of power, and was succeeded by a Whig administration, which sent Mr. Squier as its agent to Nicaragua, who denounced the Hise treaty and negotiated another, in excess, it is claimed, of his authority, with that Republic, placing the proposed canal under the joint protection and control of the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. Clayton had in the meantime become Secretary of State, and it is a little bit remarkable to note the change of circumstances then and the change of circumstances now. There the Democratic administration had practically negotiated a treaty which adopted an American policy, and the Whig administration came in and changed it. Here a Republican administration had adopted an American policy and the Democratic Party comes into power and absolutely overturns that policy. In other words, the Democrats now are taking a position diametrically opposed to the position which they took under the administration of President Polk. Mr. Clayton, without submitting to the Senate either the Hise or Squier treaties, opened negotiations with Sir Henry Bulwer, British minister at Washington, which resulted in the now famous Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, ratifying the scheme of a joint protectorate over the canal, and assenting in terms to what was practically an abandonment of the Monroe doctrine.

I do not deem it necessary to discuss the terms of this treaty, because it has been so ably analyzed and discussed by Senators who have preceded me. I merely call attention to it and the circumstances which preceded its execution in order to show that at the time of its execution Great Britain had no valid claim in Central America, and, having none, there was no foundation for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and no consideration to support either it or the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is based on it. I am induced to make this showing because it is continually stated here in nearly every speech that is made in favor of repeal that Great Britain can not now be placed in the position which she occupied prior to the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because it is claimed she has released valuable rights. I insist that she had no rights and never had any, and, therefore, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was absolutely without any consideration at all.

The language of the treaty is in some of its provisions not unlike the treaty between Spain and Great Britain, particularly that portion of it which provides that neither Great Britain nor the United States would ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the canal or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, fortify, or colonize, assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua or any part of Central America. Subsequent events have proven that at the time of the execution of the treaty Great Britain intended, as she did with Spain, to violate its terms; and she has, from the date of its execution, continued to ignore its terms, and has never abandoned, but has continued to occupy, a part of the territory which she agreed she would neither occupy, fortify, colonize, nor assume jurisdiction over. From that day to this the constant and repeated violations of the treaty and the unjust demands on the part of Great Britain have led to constant irritation and strife between the two powers.

It was my privilege to deliver an address in the Senate at the time the Panama Canal act was pending, in 1912, in which I recited a great number of protests by all administrations, Democratic and Republican, since 1850, against the repeated violations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by Great Britain; and I am not going to refer to them now.

In order to prove that the pretended claim of Great Britain at the mouth of the San Juan River—acquired, as has been stated, by fraud—was the basis of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, permit me to call attention to the message of President Franklin Pierce to Congress on the 31st of December, 1855, and the proceedings had thereon at the time of its delivery to the Senate of the United States.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, the portion of the message which refers to this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Whilst relations of amity continue to exist between the United States and all foreign powers, with some of them grave questions are depending which may require the consideration of Congress.

Of such questions the most important is that which has arisen out of the negotiations with Great Britain in reference to Central America.

By the convention concluded between the two Governments on the 19th of April, 1850, both parties covenanted that "neither will ever occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."

It was the undoubted understanding of the United States in making this treaty that all the present States of the former Republic of Central America and the entire territory of each would thenceforth enjoy complete independence, and that both contracting parties engaged equally and to the same extent for the present and for the future that if either then had any claim of right in Central America such claim and all occupation or authority under it were unreservedly relinquished by the stipulations of the convention, and that no dominion was thereafter to be exercised or assumed in any part of Central America by Great Britain or the United States.

This Government consented to restrictions in regard to a region of country wherein we had specific and peculiar interests only upon the conviction that the like restrictions were in the same sense obligatory on Great Britain. But for this understanding of the force and effect of the convention it would never have been concluded by us.

So clear was this understanding on the part of the United States that in correspondence contemporaneous with the ratification of the convention it was distinctly expressed that the mutual covenants of nonoccupation were not intended to apply to the British establishment at the Balize. This qualification is to be ascribed to the fact that in virtue of successive treaties with previous sovereigns of the country Great Britain had obtained a concession of the right to cut mahogany or dyewoods at the Balize, but with positive exclusion of all domain or sovereignty, and thus it confirms the natural construction and understood import of the treaty as to all the rest of the region to which the stipulations applied.

It, however, became apparent at an early day after entering upon the discharge of my present functions that Great Britain still continued in the exercise or assertion of large authority in all that part of Central America commonly called the Mosquito Coast and covering the entire length of the State of Nicaragua and a part of Costa Rica; that she regarded the Balize as her absolute domain and was gradually extending its limits at the expense of the State of Honduras; and that she had formally colonized a considerable insular group known as the Bay Islands and belonging of right to that State.

All these acts or pretensions of Great Britain, being contrary to the rights of the States of Central America and to the manifest tenor of her stipulations with the United States as understood by this Government, have been made the subject of negotiation through the American minister in London. I transmit herewith the instructions to him on the subject and correspondence between him and the British secretary for foreign affairs, by which you will perceive that the two Governments differ widely and irreconcilably as to the construction of the convention and its effect on their respective relations to Central America.

Great Britain so construes the convention as to maintain unchanged all her previous pretensions over the Mosquito Coast and in different parts of Central America. These pretensions as to the Mosquito Coast are founded on the assumption of political relation between Great Britain and the remnant of a tribe of Indians on that coast, entered into at a time when the whole country was a colonial possession of Spain. It can not be successfully controverted that by the public law of Europe and America no possible act of such Indians or their predecessors could confer on Great Britain any political rights.

Great Britain does not allege the assent of Spain as the origin of her claims on the Mosquito Coast. She has, on the contrary, by repeated and successive treaties renounced and relinquished all pretensions of her own and recognized the full and sovereign rights of Spain in the most unequivocal terms. Yet these pretensions, so without solid foundation in the beginning and thus repeatedly abjured, were at a recent period revived by Great Britain against the Central American States, the legitimate successors to all the ancient jurisdiction of Spain in that region. They were first applied only to a defined part of the coast of Nicaragua, afterwards to the whole of its Atlantic coast, and lastly to a part of the coast of Costa Rica, and they are now reasserted to this extent, notwithstanding engagements to the United States.

On the eastern coast of Nicaragua and Costa Rica the interference of Great Britain, though exerted at one time in the form of military occupation of the port of San Juan del Norte, then in the peaceful possession of the appropriate authorities of the Central American States, is now presented by her as the rightful exercise of a protectorship over the Mosquito Tribe of Indians.

But the establishment at the Belize, now reaching far beyond its treaty limits into the State of Honduras, and that of the Bay Islands, appertaining of right to the same State, are as distinctly colonial governments as those of Jamaica or Canada, and therefore contrary to the very letter as well as the spirit of the convention with the United States as it was at the time of ratification and now is understood by this Government.

The interpretation which the British Government thus, in assertion and act, persists in ascribing to the convention entirely changes its character. While it holds us to all our obligations, it in a great measure releases Great Britain from those which constituted the consideration of this Government for entering into the convention. It is impossible, in my judgment, for the United States to acquiesce in such a construction of the respective relations of the two Governments to Central America.

To a renewed call by this Government upon Great Britain to abide by and carry into effect the stipulations of the convention according to its obvious import by withdrawing from the possession or colonization of portions of the Central American States of Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, the British Government has at length replied, affirming that the operation of the treaty is prospective only and did not require Great Britain to abandon or contract any possessions held by her in Central America at the date of its conclusion.

This reply substitutes a partial issue in the place of the general one presented by the United States. The British Government passes over the question of the rights of Great Britain, real or supposed, in Central America and assumes that she had such rights at the date of the treaty, and that those rights comprehended the protectorship of the Mosquito Indians, the extended jurisdiction and limits of the Belize, and the colony of the Bay Islands, and thereupon proceed by implication to infer that if the stipulations of the treaty be merely future in effect Great Britain may still continue to hold the contested portions of Central America. The United States can not admit either the inference or the premises. We steadily deny that at the date of the treaty Great Britain had any possessions there other than the limited and peculiar establishment at Belize, and maintain that if she had any they were surrendered by the convention.

This Government, recognizing the obligations of the treaty, has, of course, desired to see it executed in good faith by both parties, and in the discussion, therefore, has not looked to rights which we might assert independently of the treaty in consideration of our geographical position and of other circumstances which create for us relations to the Central American States different from those of any Government of Europe.

The British Government in its last communication, although well knowing the views of the United States, still declares that it sees no reason why a conciliatory spirit may not enable the two Governments to overcome all obstacles to a satisfactory adjustment of the subject.

Assured of the correctness of the construction of the treaty constantly adhered to by this Government and resolved to insist on the rights of the United States, yet actuated also by the same desire which is avowed by the British Government, to remove all causes of serious misunderstanding between two nations associated by so many ties of interest and kindred, it has appeared to me proper not to consider an amicable solution of the controversy hopeless.

There is, however, reason to apprehend that with Great Britain in the actual occupation of the disputed territories, and the treaty therefore practically null, so far as regards our rights, this international difficulty can not long remain undetermined without involving in serious danger the friendly relations which it is the interest as well as the duty of both countries to cherish and preserve. It will afford me sincere gratification if future efforts shall result in the success anticipated heretofore with more confidence than the aspect of the case permits me now to entertain.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This was a ringing protest as far back as 1855 against the repeated violations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by Great Britain. I call your attention to a small portion of it to show you the flimsy pretext upon which Great Britain was asserting her right to remain in possession of the property which she was claiming in Central America:

To a renewed call by this Government upon Great Britain to abide by and carry into effect the stipulations of the convention according to its obvious import by withdrawing from the possession or colonization of portions of the Central American States of Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, the British Government has at length replied, affirming that the operation of the treaty is prospective only and did not require Great Britain to abandon or contract any possessions held by her in Central America at the date of its conclusion.

In other words, she claimed that she did not agree to give up anything, and as a matter of fact she did not give up anything, and she never has given up anything, but continues to occupy the same territory now which she occupied then, and which she agreed that she would abandon.

I have set out at length the portion of the President's message which deals with Great Britain's pretensions along the coast of Central America, and I call particular attention to the fact that she scrupulously and purposely avoided the issue which had been raised by our Government that she was violating the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and set up the palpably dishonest contention that the operation of the treaty was prospective only and did not require Great Britain to abandon or contract any possessions held by her in Central America at the date of its conclusion. What more dishonest, what more preposterous claim could have been made by any Government that wanted to observe the stipulations of a treaty which were plain on their face and impossible of misconstruction? The contention that the treaty with reference to occupation, colonization, fortification, and exercise of dominion was prospective in its operation was so entirely disingenuous and dishonest that when this message of the President was delivered to Congress Mr. Clayton, who had been Secretary of State when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was negotiated, during the Whig administrations of Presidents Taylor and Fillmore and was serving in the Senate from the State of Delaware, immediately arose and with much heat and feeling denounced the preposterous claims of Great Britain, discussed at length the reasons which led to the execution of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and gave the understanding of the parties with reference to its terms and conditions.

In the course of his explanation he candidly admitted that the possession by Great Britain of the Mosquito country and Greytown, with its gradual extension to other adjoining territory, disturbed the administration of which he had been a part; and, as I read what he had to say upon the subject, I am inclined to believe that the timidity of the administration led to this great diplomatic blunder. Can it be that the timidity of a Democratic administration at this time is likely to lead us into the commission of a diplomatic blunder more serious, if possible, than that committed by a Whig administration in the execution of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

Mr. Clayton, in the course of his remarks on that portion of the President's message which I have quoted, said in part:

It is a construction put upon the treaty by the British Cabinet for which they are certainly entitled to all the merit of originality and novelty. Prospective in its operation! I never dreamed of such a thing. Merely prospective! Does any man suppose that I, in the possession of my senses, could have entered into a treaty with Great Britain to allow her to remain in possession of the whole of this isthmus and to prohibit my own countrymen from taking possession of it, leaving her there undisturbed? What could we gain by it? What inducement could there have been on our part to enter into such a treaty? What motive could an American statesman have in making such a treaty? What motive could any American Senator have had in voting for the ratification of such an instrument? Is it possible that any man on earth can have his understanding so perverted as to believe for a single moment that that view was in the contemplation of the negotiators? * * * Sir, Great Britain having denied the plain meaning of the treaty, as she has done, we should be perfectly justified in breaking up the treaty on our part if that would place us in any better condition. Now, I ask the attention of the Senate for but a few moments to consider that point. We have the right, in foro conscientiæ, to annul the treaty, and we should be justified before the civilized world for annulling it if it be our interest to do so.

Here was a Senator who knew all about the terms of that treaty. He knew just as much about it as it is claimed now that Mr. Choate and Mr. Hay and other distinguished gentlemen knew about the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. If the rule of construction which the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] appealed to yesterday is to apply in this case, we appeal to the record as made by Mr. Clayton to show that the ink had hardly gotten dry on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in 1850 when it was violated, and we too are in foro conscientiæ entitled to denounce it before the eyes of the civilized world. That contention has been made by every administration since that date.

But for the fact that others who have addressed themselves to this subject have gone into the matter fully, I might show that nearly every President since 1850, except during the Civil War, when little attention was paid to it, have repeatedly protested against repeated violations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by Great Britain. I therefore deem it unnecessary to call attention in detail to these protests.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty had hardly been ratified when controversies arose between the signatory powers as to its intent and meaning, and it is interesting to read the discussions which took place in the Senate of the United States in reference to the actions of Great Britain which were violative of the terms of the treaty and the proper construction thereof. There were those in Congress then, as there are those here to-day, who appeared to be more afraid of arousing the antagonism of Great Britain and other foreign powers than they were desirous of protecting the interests of our own country and of our own citizens. But there were patriotic men then who were more interested in the latter than in the former. In March, 1853, Senator Stephen A. Douglas, in discussing this very subject with Senator Clayton, of Delaware, took a very different position from that which many Democrats are taking to-day.

I want to say here, parenthetically, that neither Stephen A. Douglas nor Mr. Clayton were at variance about the fact that Great Britain was violating the treaty. They got into a warm discussion about it, but they were agreed upon the proposition that it was being violated.

Now, note what Mr. Douglas said. I think it is very appropriate to-day:

When was it that Great Britain seized the possession of the terminus of this canal? Just six days after the signing of the treaty which secured to us California? The moment England saw that by the pending negotiations with Mexico California was to be acquired, she collected her fleets and made preparations for the seizure of the port of San Juan, in order that she might be gatekeeper on the public highway to our new possessions on the Pacific. Within six days from the time we signed the treaty England seized by force and violence the very point now in controversy. Is not this fact indicative of her motives? Is it not clear that her object was to obstruct our passage to our new possessions? Hence I do not sympathize with that feeling which the Senator expressed yesterday, that it was a pity to have a difference with a nation so friendly to us as England. Sir, I do not see the evidence of her friendship. It is not in the nature of things that she can be our friend. It is impossible she can love us. I do not blame her for not loving us. Sir, we have wounded her vanity and humbled her pride. She can never forgive us. But for us she would be the first power on the face of the earth. But for us she would have the prospect of maintaining that proud position which she held for so long a period. We are in her way. She is jealous of us, and jealousy forbids the idea of friendship. England does not love us; she can not love us, and we do not love her, either. We have some things in the past to remember that are not agreeable. She has more in the present to humiliate her that she can not forgive.

I do not wish to administer to the feeling of jealousy and rivalry that exists between us and England. I wish to soften and allay it as much as possible. But why close our eyes to the fact that friendship is impossible while jealousy exists? Hence England seizes every island in the sea and rock upon our coast where she can plant a gun to intimidate us or to annoy our commerce. Her policy has been to seize every military and naval station the world over. Why does she pay such enormous sums to keep her post at Gibraltar except to hold it in terrorem over the commerce of the Mediterranean? Why her enormous expense to maintain a garrison at the Cape of Good Hope except to command the great passage on the way to the Indies? Why is she at the expense to keep her position on the little barren islands, Bermuda and the miserable Bahamas, and all the other islands along our coast except as sentinels upon our actions? Does England hold Bermuda because of any profit it is to her? Has she any other motive for retaining it except jealousy, which stimulates hostility to us? Is it not the case with all her possessions along our coast? Why, then, talk about the friendly bearing of England toward us when she is extending that policy every day? New treaties of friendship, seizure of islands, and erection of new colonies in violation of her treaties seem to be the order of the day. In view of this state of things, I am in favor of meeting England as we meet a rival—meet her boldly, treat her justly and fairly, but make no humiliating concession even for the sake of peace. She has as much reason to make concessions to us as we have to make them to her. I would not willingly disturb the peace of the world; but, sir, the Bay Island colony must be discontinued. It violates the treaty.

And she then had possession of the Bay Islands in distinct violation of the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

If the "Little Giant" were alive to-day, he would doubtless call attention to the course of Great Britain in acquiring control of the Suez Canal after its construction by the French, and the strategic positions at each entrance thereof, just as she attempted to secure the Atlantic and Pacific entrances to a Nicaraguan canal, and as she is attempting to secure a voice in the Panama Canal to-day.

On the same subject he said, further—and I will say to the Members on this side of the Chamber that this ought to be pretty good Democratic authority—

> This question of a canal in Nicaragua, when negotiations were pending to give it to us, was so much an American question that the English Government was not entitled to be consulted. England not consent! She will acquiesce in your doing what you may deem right so long as you consent to allow her to hold Canada, the Bermudas, Jamaica, and her other American possessions.

The same contention was made then, Mr. President, that is made to-day—that the powers of the earth are protesting against our violation of the treaty with Great Britain and that Great Britain must consent to our doing this or doing that before we are permitted to do anything. Will the time ever come, as was said by Stephen A. Douglas, when we can determine for ourselves as to what affects our national integrity and purposes without consulting Great Britain or some other foreign power?

> I hope the time has arrived when we will not be told any more that Europe will not consent to this, and England will not consent to that. I heard that argument till I got tired of it when we were discussing the resolutions for the annexation of Texas. I heard it again on the Oregon question, and I heard it on the California question. It has been said on every occasion whenever we had an issue about acquiring territory—that England would not consent; yet she has acquiesced in whatever we had the courage and the justice to do. And why? Because we kept ourselves in the right. England was so situated with her possessions on this continent that she dare not fight in an unjust cause. We would have been in the right to have accepted the privilege of making this canal, and England would never have dared to provoke a controversy with us. I think the time has come when America should perform her duty according to our own judgment and our own sense of justice without regard to what European powers might say with respect to it. I think this Nation is about of age. I think we have a right to judge for ourselves. Let us always do right and put the consequences behind us.

I quote thus at length from a distinguished Democrat to show the difference in the attitude of our party leaders immediately following the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and their attitude now with respect to a treaty which has no other foundation whatsoever than a treaty which was executed in 1850 and which was based on force, fraud, and treaty violation.

I say "our party leaders." I do not know but that there is a new Richmond in the field as the leader of the Democracy now, in the person of the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], a gentleman whom some seem anxious to follow, but whom I have heard denounced by Democratic spellbinders on many stumps in the East and West. We must concede and give him the credit for having originated this scheme for repeal. There is no question about that. The Taft administration and a Republican Senate and a majority of the Democrats in Congress had settled it beyond any peradventure of a doubt, and the British contention had been practically abandoned when the distinguished senior Senator from New York, in the early days of January, 1913, introduced a resolution to repeal the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act. Then, on the 21st of January, 1913, he made a speech in favor of repeal, although when the Panama Canal act was pending he said that, inasmuch as he differed with the gentlemen of the Senate, he did not like to express his views in a matter which involved our country. He is the author of this proposition to repeal, and I give him credit for it. If he can win over the Democrats to his way of thinking, I commend him all the more highly for it; but we certainly have a new leader of Democracy to-day in the person of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

That speech has gone out to millions of people in this country, sent out by an association—the Carnegie Peace Foundation—which pretends that it has for its purpose the cultivation of peace between the powers of the earth. Knowing, as the men who had that fund in charge knew, that Congress had passed a bill exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, they nevertheless were sending out a speech on one side of a question only and educating the people to see that one side, and were not undertaking to have the people reach a correct solution of a great international controversy. I have no patience with such efforts at world peace. Why was that done? Echo answers, Why?

If I were to undertake to use the language which was used by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, Mr. Douglas—and I might say the distinguished Senator from Delaware, Mr. Clayton—I would be charged with demagogy and with jingoism. That is the only answer to the arguments of those who are in favor of an American policy. We are denounced by the press and papers of the country as undertaking to indulge in demagogy.

There are those in Congress who prate about national honor. We heard much of it yesterday, as though there were only a few people in the Senate who have any idea of national honor. I venture to say that my distinguished friends who sit opposite me now, and who honor me by their presence, have just as high a regard for our national honor as the distinguished senior Senator from New York, who addressed the Senate yesterday. Has he a monopoly of national honor? Has any Senator a monopoly of that quality of a good American citizen? I think we have just as much regard for the national honor as anybody; I presume, in fact I prophesy and predict, that in the next 90 days that speech delivered here yesterday will be circulated by the same Carnegie Peace Foundation, in the effort to train the minds of the people of this country, the schools, the colleges, the churches, to one way of looking at this Hay-Pauncefote treaty and our other treaties with Great Britain, which from our standpoint at least is an absolutely incorrect view to take of this whole situation.

I repeat, Mr. President, if I were to use on the floor of the Senate such language as that which I have quoted, I would be charged by those who espouse the cause of Great Britain with jingoism, but the views of Democrats and Whigs who placed national interest above the fear of offense to Great Britain were in line with those of the distinguished Democrat from Illinois.

So it is to-day. There are those in Congress who prate about the national honor instead of boldly assuming a position which will give the world to understand that the United States is to be its own judge as to what affects the national honor as well as those matters which affect the national interest. This was done in 1912, and from that patriotic position we are about to recede, and for reasons which no one has even been candid enough to state.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I introduced a resolution here a year or two ago to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It was not necessary to give any notice of the intended abrogation by the United States of either of those treaties. Most treaties usually provide that either party has the right to abrogate them on giving the other contracting party a certain notice, but neither of these treaties required anything of that kind. If I recall it aright, I was denounced as a jingoist here for having introduced that resolution. I meant it in perfect good faith. Indeed, if we had gone on then and abrogated both those treaties we would have been out of a whole lot of trouble that confronts us now and that is likely to confront us more seriously in the future.

To show you that other Democrats have entertained the same view, I call attention to the fact that in 1900—I did not know it until this morning I was looking this matter up a little—the distinguished Senator from Alabama, the late Mr. Morgan, introduced a resolution, No. 392, for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This was in the Fifty-sixth Congress, first session. It recites:

> Resolved by the Senate, That the treaty known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between Great Britain and the United States, which was concluded on the 19th day of April, 1850, is abrogated.

It ought to have been done then. It ought to have been done while Presidents of the United States and Secretaries of State were protesting against the repeated violations of it by Great Britain.

Now, I will call your attention to a further fact in this connection. Some Senators seem to take to the view that the Congress in 1912 was the only Congress we ever had that seemed disposed to annul that treaty or either of those treaties. There was introduced in the House, May 3, 1900, a bill, House bill 2538, to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. That was across the very territory that Great Britain was claiming she had some interest in. That was across Nicaragua, through the very route that is covered by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That bill passed the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote. In other words, the Members of the House, Democrats and Republicans, at that time took the position that they had the right to build the canal across the very territory that Great Britain is now claiming some jurisdiction over under the two treaties that we have with her, and they did not deem it incumbent upon them to mention the fact that we had any treaty with Great Britain. They passed the bill, and, so far as the House was concerned, by passing the bill repealed and abrogated the treaty.

In this connection—I mention it now, while I have this resolution and this bill before me—Mr. Morgan, as chairman of the Interoceanic Canals Committee of the Senate, submitted quite a lengthy report on the resolution which I have just read proposing the abrogation of the treaty. Mr. Morgan says, among other things:

> The legislative powers of the Senate are higher and broader than its treaty-making power, and when these functions are appealed to by different departments of the Government, on the same subject and at the same time, and with opposing requests, there can be no doubt that the highest power should be exerted to settle the question in controversy, thereby relieving the country of all doubt and uncertainty.

The House bill accomplishes this result without attempting to restrain or coerce the treaty-making power of the President and the Senate. It only provides for conditions that are presented and demand the attention of Congress, by resorting to the supreme and paramount law-making power and demanding its exercise in acts of legislation.

It is insisted, however, that when Congress has declared the supreme will of the people in a solemn enactment of law the President and the Senate can not lawfully obstruct or avoid such a declaration by any treaty they can conclude with any foreign power.

In other words, applying the argument which is made at length by Senator Morgan here, and he was a distinguished international lawyer, that Congress had the right to pass the act to which I have called attention, and which in effect operated as a repeal of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the act of 1912 had the effect to repeal the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and if any part of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty remained, it had the effect to repeal that. As a proposition of law I insist that the mere repeal of the act of 1912 or any portion of it will not have the effect to reinstate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. In other words, the highest constitutional body of this country, namely, the Congress of the United States, has enacted a law which abrogates a treaty, and now can we by repealing that statute make it retroactive in its effect or prospective, if you will, and reinstate a treaty which we have already repealed?

I may be mistaken in that position; but that is the argument of Senator Morgan, and he certainly had much experience in this particular matter, because no man in the United States ever gave the construction of a transisthmian canal so much consideration as did he.

So when we are talking about observing treaty obligations, what is to happen after we repeal the act of 1912? Must we then enter into negotiations again with Great Britain for a treaty governing the very subject which I say is sealed by the act of 1912?

Mr. President, for convenience of reference in what I have to say, I desire to have the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty inserted as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such will be the order, without objection

The matter referred to is as follows:

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY OF APRIL 19, 1850.

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States, and Her Britannic Majesty on the Right Hon. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, a member of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council, knight commander of the most honorable Order of the Bath, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty to the United States, for the aforesaid purpose; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

"ARTICLE 2.

"Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

"ARTICLE 3.

"In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local government or governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used, or to be used, for that object, shall be protected, from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

"ARTICLE 4.

"The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise with any State, States, or Governments possessing or claiming to possess any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse, or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such States or Governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power. And furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The contracting parties further engage, that when the said canal shall have been completed, they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free, and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal, and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments, or either Government, if both Governments, or either Government, should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guarantee without first giving six months' notice to the other.

"The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every State with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

"It being desirable that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain determine to give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, with the necessary capital, the consent of the local authorities, and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention; and if any persons or company should already have, with any State through which the proposed ship canal may pass, a contract for the construction of such a canal as that specified in this convention, to the stipulations of which contract neither of the contracting parties in this convention have any just cause to object, and the said persons or company shall moreover have made preparations, and expended time, money, and trouble, on the faith of such contract, it is hereby agreed that such persons or company shall have a priority of claim over every other person, persons, or company to the protection of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and be allowed a year from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention for concluding their arrangements, and presenting evidence of sufficient capital subscribed to accomplish the contemplated undertaking; it being understood that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid period, such persons or company be not able to commence and carry out the proposed enterprise, then the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be free to afford their protection to any other persons or company that shall be prepared to commence and proceed with the construction of the canal in question.

"ARTICLE 8.

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

"ARTICLE 9.

"The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from this day, or sooner if possible.

"In faith whereof we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed our seals.

"Done at Washington the 19th day of April, anno Domini 1850.

"JOHN M. CLAYTON. [L. S.]

"HENRY LYTTON BULWER. [L. S.]"

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY OF 1901.

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the afore-mentioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal—that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it will be observed, had reference to the construction of a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans across the Isthmus by a particular route, namely, "by way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean." In other words, it had reference to the construction of a canal across territory which was not owned by or under the jurisdiction of either power. While it is true that article 8 of the treaty provided that "the Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object"—that is, the construction of a canal over the route indicated—"but also to establish a general principle"—that is, the principle of neutralization of the canal—"they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or by railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by way of Tehuantepec or Panama," it must not be forgotten that at the time of the execution of the treaty both Tehuantepec and Panama were under the jurisdiction of other powers than either Great Britain or the United States, and neither country had any jurisdiction or rights of sovereignty over either of the routes named. It had reference to a canal to be constructed by private capital, and neither Government contemplated entering upon such an undertaking at Nicaragua or elsewhere.

At the time of the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the same conditions prevailed with reference to the status of the parties, and both the signatory powers had in view the construction of a canal over and through territory which was not under the jurisdiction of either.

Mr. President, I think I have shown—and if time permitted, much more testimony could be adduced to sustain my position—both by the highest British authority as well as by contemporaneous history, and particularly by the statements of the Secretary of State who negotiated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty on the part of the United States: First, that Great Britain had no valid title to any possessions along the coast of Nicaragua, either at the Atlantic or Pacific terminus of the then proposed canal; second, that all her claims were fraudulent or were acquired by force, or through the violation of the treaties with Spain, or in contempt of the settled policy of the United States with reference to colonization on the American Continent; third, that from the date of its execution to that of the execution of the last Hay-Pauncefote treaty there was never a day when Great Britain was not flagrantly violating the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, against the earnest and indignant protests of every party and of every administration; fourth, that the treaty, even if it ever had any force or validity, had been practically abandoned by both the signatory powers; and, fifth, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty having been without consideration, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty could not have any greater binding force or validity than that upon which it was founded. I think, sir, we should cease prating about violations of national integrity and honor, particularly in view of the fact that a former Congress of the United States after long weeks of discussion placed its own construction upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and decided that an act which gave to American vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic the right of passage through the canal without the payment of tolls did not violate, either in letter or in spirit, the terms of this treaty. The same conclusion was reached by President Taft; Mr. Knox, Secretary of State; Mr. Wickersham, Attorney General—all distinguished lawyers, who had given the subject the greatest consideration—not to mention Mr. Olney, Secretary of State under President Cleveland; Mr. Bonaparte, Attorney General under President Roosevelt, and many other distinguished lawyers of the country.

I want to call attention to a statement made by the senior Senator from New York yesterday, and the same statement was made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] when he addressed the Senate. Both undertake to link the treaty with Panama made in 1904 with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 and claim that the Panama treaty was not any broader than the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; in other words, that we had no more power under the Panama treaty than we had under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because, as was claimed, the Panama treaty refers in terms and is made subject to the stipulations made in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. But both Senators have omitted one fact that it seems to me was deserving of their notice, and that is the provision in the Panama treaty which provides that we will pass certain ships of Panama through the canal without the payment of tolls.

In other words, a part of the consideration paid by the United States to the Panama Republic for the canal strip was the passage of certain of their ships through the canal without the payment of any tolls. If the insistence of the Senators be correct, we deceived Panama; in other words, we undertook to give something we had no right to give, a part of the consideration for the construction of the Panama Canal fails, and our rights at Panama fall to the ground.

Why did not the Senators explain that? Had we the right, as a matter of fact, as a part of the consideration for the purchase, to grant them certain rights in the Panama Canal? If we had a right to grant it to any power, do we not have the same right to let our own coastwise vessels pass through the Panama Canal without the payment of tolls?

There is another reason which might be urged in favor of the Panama Canal act of 1912. At the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was executed, as I have stated, the relations of the signatory powers with respect to the territory through which the Panama Canal has been constructed was practically the same as it was when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was executed. It had reference therefore to the construction of a canal through foreign territory. At the time the construction of the canal was entered upon, however, the relation of the parties had entirely changed, for before the construction of the canal commenced the independence of Panama had been recognized as a separate and independent Republic, and on the 25th day of May, 1904, the United States entered into a treaty with this Republic, under the terms of which there was granted to the United States a strip of territory 10 miles wide and other valuable rights to be used in connection with the construction of the canal; and not only did the title pass, but sovereignty was granted, for certain purposes, over the cities at the termini thereof; so that the relations of the parties as well as the locus of the proposed canal had entirely changed. Instead of canal construction through foreign territory the work was to be done on American soil. It was to be done over territory that was absolutely the property of the United States and under its sovereignty and jurisdiction. It is a well-settled principle of international law that where there has been a change in the relation of the parties to a treaty with respect to the subject matter thereof, the treaty is to that extent abrogated and annulled. The maxim "Conventio omnis intelligitur rebus stantibus" is held to apply to all cases in which the reason for a treaty has failed, or there has been such a change of circumstances as to make its performance impracticable except at an unreasonable sacrifice.

From my viewpoint, I feel that in the position which we occupy we not only have the right to pass the coastwise vessels through the canal without the payment of tolls, but we have a right to pass any vessels of the United States through without the payment of tolls. I question if it would be good policy for us to undertake to pass our ships engaged in over-sea commerce through the canal without the payment of tolls, but there is every reason in the world why we should exercise that right in reference to our coastwise vessels.

It is true, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], that article 18 of the treaty with Panama, by inference, made the Hay-Pauncefote treaty a part of it, but it is also true that rights were given to Panama under that treaty which it is now claimed the United States can not enjoy herself. Were we deceiving Panama and pretending to give her something we had no power to give in part pay for the territory over which the canal has been built? No other position can consistently be taken by the advocates of repeal.

Not only does a change in the status of the parties and the subject matter of a treaty have the effect to revoke it, but a subsequent act of Congress has the same effect; and the Congress of the United States, if it saw fit to revoke the treaty for the preservation of our national interests, could do so, even if there was a conflict between the national interest and national honor; and that was the effect of the act passed in 1912 when Congress placed its construction upon the treaty in question and practically determined that no question of national honor nor any violation of treaty stipulations was involved in exempting our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls. That act operated as a repeal of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It has been held that a subsequent treaty supersedes an act of Congress with which it is in conflict, as in Ware v. Hylton (3 Dall., 199); and, conversely, that a subsequent act of Congress abrogates a treaty although in violation of its terms. (Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curtis, C. C., 445; Ropes v. Church, 8 Blatch., 304; the Cherokee Tobacco Cases, 11 Wall., 616.)

In this connection I call attention of the Senate to the fact that no treaty can deprive Congress of control over our internal affairs. It will be remembered that the Chinese-exclusion acts were passed notwithstanding treaty stipulations, and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained these laws, on the theory that the preservation of our people must be the paramount law, and that no treaty could have the effect of depriving Congress of the right to legislate for the people of the United States. President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, who, I believe, is an advocate of repeal, is quoted by a newspaper correspondent as having stated in a recent article that—

> It is established law in this country that a treaty made between the United States and a foreign nation is subject to such acts as Congress may subsequently pass for its modification or abrogation. It is not even necessary to discuss with the other party to the international contract what it thinks of the proposed action of the Congress of the United States. This means that a treaty made by one constitutional agency may be modified or abrogated by another constitutional agency which is quite distinct from the treaty-making power. This * * * doctrine has been laid down by the most eminent judges in the land. * * * The highest courts have held, therefore, that while a treaty and an act of Congress are both binding upon the courts, the one which is later in point of time takes precedence in respect to authority. Whether a treaty has been violated by our domestic legislation so as to be the proper action of complaint by a foreign Government is held not to be a judicial question. To the courts it is simply a case of conflicting laws, the later modifying or superseding the earlier. * * *

I do not vouch for the accuracy of the quotation, but whether President Butler used the language attributed to him or not, it accurately states the law governing the subject. It is based upon that law and upon the arguments of Senator Morgan that I make my insistence that the act of 1912 was as complete an abrogation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and was as complete an abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as if they had been expressly named in the terms of the act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. In making the statement just made the Senator from Oregon does not intend to assert or to admit that the act of 1912 is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all; but the advocates of repeal are insisting that it was.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, but if it is not in conflict, then, of course, the treaty is not abrogated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was only undertaking to answer the argument of those who claim that it was in absolute opposition to the treaty. From my viewpoint—and I think the Senator and I agree on it—it is not in conflict with the treaty, and I think so far as the act is concerned it might stand.

It could not have been in contemplation of the signatory powers when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was executed that any provision therein could in any way or manner affect our coastwise shipping. It could not have been and was not contemplated that the United States would subsequently acquire title to the territory over which the canal was to be built. It could not have been in the minds of the parties that the land through which the Panama Canal might later be built would ever become a part of the coast line of the United States. Otherwise it must be assumed that some provision would have been inserted therein upon the insistence of Mr. Choate or Mr. Hay, who had much to do with the execution of the treaty, that would have safeguarded beyond any question American coastwise shipping, and would have placed American coastwise vessels at least in as favorable a position as vessels of other countries engaged in their coastwise trade; for, as was clearly shown by the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] the word "vessel," as used in the treaties of all nations, has always been interpreted to mean vessels engaged in the over-seas trade. To indulge in any other assumption than this would be to assume that the representatives of the United States were recreant to duty and false to the best interests of their country; and no one, whether on this or the other side of the Chamber, would care to reflect upon the integrity of either of these distinguished men.

If the effect of the act of 1912 was to revoke the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is questionable whether the repeal of the statute would have the effect to reinstate the same.

THE ACT OF 1912 VIOLATES NO TREATY.

But is the toll-exemption clause now proposed to be repealed in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? This treaty in the express terms of article 1 supersedes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 9, 1850. After reciting the desire of the signatory powers of facilitating the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and of removing any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 9, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention," each proceeds to name its plenipotentiaries for the purpose of the execution of a treaty. That general principle of neutralization referred to in the preamble, upon which the argument of those who favor repeal is based, is to be found in article 3, subdivision 1, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and is as follows:

> The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:
> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Permit me to observe, in answer to this contention, first, that there has been no neutralization of the Suez Canal under the convention of Constantinople signed October 28, 1888, and the friends of repeal are all the time talking about the neutralization of this canal under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty quoted; second, we violate no principle of international law or any treaty obligation in exempting our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls, and we might go even further and exempt our own vessels engaged in foreign commerce without doing violence to the terms of the treaty and without subjecting our country to the charge of disregarding the national honor.

In support of the first proposition, I desire to insert herein an article from the Spectator of December, 1898, and published in London, inclosed by United States Ambassador White to Mr. Hay in a communication dated at London, December 22, 1898.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Spectator, December 10, 1898.]

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

We pointed out at the end of last summer that it could not be long before our statesmen would have to bring their minds to bear upon the question of the Nicaragua Canal and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and this is exactly what has happened. The assertion by the President of the United States in his message to Congress that "the construction [of the Nicaragua Canal] is now more than ever indispensable, and our policy more imperatively than ever calls for its control by this Government," has at once brought the matter within the region of practical politics. We make no claim to any special prescience in the matter. The Americans have always longed for an interoceanic canal, and it was evident that directly they had acquired possessions in the West Indies opposite the coasts of Central America, and also an island empire in the Pacific, they would desire to link them by water communication. A revival of interest in the Nicaragua Canal was thus an inevitable sequence of the war. But the Americans can not obtain that control over the Nicaragua Canal which they desire unless we are willing to abandon our rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—an instrument under which both powers bound themselves not to obtain an exclusive control over any interoceanic canal. We and the Americans, that is, agreed some 48 years ago that a canal should only be made and controlled by the two powers acting together, and in no case by either power singly. Thus, if we choose we can no doubt veto the making of the canal and prevent the Americans doing what they so very much want to do. The people of this country have, therefore, to consider whether they will or will not veto the canal. We are glad to see already a good many indications that we do not intend to exercise our right of veto. The Times in its leading article on the President's message uses words which will, we believe, be indorsed not only by the Government but by the majority of English people.

The Times says, most reasonably, that "if the freedom of the waterway were secured to ships of all nations, as in the case of the Suez Canal, we do not see what object we should have in standing strictly upon claims which originated when the circumstances were altogether different." Not less statesmanlike has been the tone adopted by the St. James Gazette. It has, however, been suggested by the Daily Mail, on the other hand, that we ought not to give up our rights, and that we should insist upon a joint control of the waterway. We do not think, however, that this contention will, if it is carefully examined, find favor here. Joint control, in the first place, means joint guaranties and joint expenditure, and we do not believe that the people of this country are prepared to spend money in Nicaragua. We have plenty of objects nearer home on which to use our spare cash. When we can get all we want out of an interoceanic canal controlled by America, why should we burden ourselves in the matter? The United States, as the power most nearly and vitally interested, may think it worth while to construct or help construct the canal, but our interests do not extend so far. All we want is that the canal shall be made, and that when it is made it shall be open and available to our merchant ships and ships of war as freely as to those of the United States or of other powers. We merely want an open waterway that no one will be able to tamper with. Now, our contention is that we secure this object better through American control than by any other means. Indeed, if America holds the canal, it will be of more use to us in time of war than if we held it ourselves. Supposing the canal ours or merely the property of Nicaragua, a hostile power might block it in the first instance as our property, and in the second, in defiance of a weak State. If, however, it is controlled by America, we need have no fear of being unable to use it, for it will be in hands strong enough to defend it. Take the case of a war with France, Russia, and Germany, and the canal in the hands of the United States. In such a case we might be hard pressed and should find it most convenient to be able to pass our ships through the canal without having to guard its two mouths by protecting squadrons. The canal would be a great neutral harbor with two outlets. Only in the case of war with the United States would American control be anything but a benefit.

But even in that case we doubt whether American control would be worse than joint control. The command of the sea would have to be fought out, and the canal would fall to the victor as the prize. We fail, then, to see why we should make ourselves disagreeable to the Americans by vetoing the canal. Rather, we hold that we ought to look with the greatest possible satisfaction upon its construction. What is meant by "control" is a matter which requires attention. An able American publicist, Prof. Woolsey, of Yale, in his work on America's Foreign Policy, recently published by the Century Co., of New York, has argued, and with considerable force and ingenuity, that America would gain nothing by exclusive control, and that she had much better claim no more rights in the canal than those given to any other power. Possibly he is right in theory, but in practice some one power will always have the control of any piece of territory, and so of every artificial waterway. It was intended, it will be remembered, that the Suez Canal should be neutralized, and Mr. Woolsey, making a most pardonable blunder, imagines that it was neutralized. In reality the neutrality convention was never brought into force, and is now a dead letter, as the Spaniards found when they tried to coal their fleet at Port Said. They claimed to regard the Suez Canal as an international piece of water, but Lord Cromer insisted, and maintained his point, that it was part of the waters of a neutral power. The Suez Canal is not internationalized, but is under the control of the power that controls Egypt. It is this kind of control, we take it, that America intends to exercise. What we suppose will happen is something of this kind: Congress will refuse to vote money to be used anywhere except in United States territory, and accordingly a narrow strip of land on each side of the proposed waterway will be granted by Nicaragua and Costa Rica. If this is the plan ultimately adopted, there will, of course, be no need of a protectorate treaty with Nicaragua. The canal will be made in United States territory.

We come now to the practical side of the question. What answer are we to make to America if, or rather when, she asks us to agree to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? It has been suggested that we should ask for compensation elsewhere or try to make a bargain for trade facilities. Possibly the plan might succeed, but we confess we dislike such huckstering between nations, especially when they involve demands upon a nation's internal fiscal policy. We hold that it would not only be more dignified, but also more beneficial to us in the long run, to ask for no payment for giving up what has as a matter of fact proved merely a sort of double-barreled agreement by England and America to play dog in the manger to each other. We would rather abrogate the treaty out of good will and good feeling than for any direct quid pro quo. Let us show the world that, though in the case of foreigners, we shall be tenacious of our treaty rights to the last iota, we can in the case of our own kith and kin think of their interests and wishes as well as of our own. The only conditions which we would make should concern the canal itself. We would abrogate the treaty on the following terms:

(1) That within the next 10 years the United States should make or obtain the making of an interoceanic canal; (2) that she and no other power should exercise control over the waterway and banks of the canal; (3) that if the United States ever abandoned her power of control, it should be offered first to Great Britain; (4) that the canal should be open at all times to all nations at peace with the United States; (5) that the dues charged should be the same in the case of American and other vessels. If the United States were to agree, as they believe they would, to such terms as these, we could have no possible ground for refusing to give up our rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That treaty was, no doubt, sincerely meant on both sides to be an act of friendship. It has turned out to be at the best an instrument of mortmain; at the worst, a troublesome cause of friction; and it should, therefore, be got rid of.

The "force of circumstances" is often the most ironical of goddesses, but sometimes she brings about things which are curiously fitting and appropriate. When one half of the Anglo-Saxon race holds the waterway between the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean, what could be more appropriate than that the other half should hold that between the Atlantic and Pacific? When the Americans hold Lake Nicaragua as we held Lake Timsah, the wheel will have come full circle. It is not for us to delay, but to hasten, that auspicious hour.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The part I desire to call particular attention to is what the writer had to say in reference to the statement of Prof. Woolsey, of Yale College, in his work America's Foreign Policy. The Spectator says:

It was intended, it will be remembered, that the Suez Canal should be neutralized, and Mr. Woolsey, making a most pardonable blunder, imagines that it was neutralized.

And our distinguished Senators who talk about the neutralization seem to go on the assumption that the Suez Canal was neutralized, and that therefore we must neutralize the Panama Canal in the same way under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Continuing, the Spectator says:

In reality the neutrality convention was never brought into force and is now a dead letter, as the Spaniards found when they tried to coal their fleet at Port Said. They claimed to regard the Suez Canal as an international piece of water, but Lord Cromer insisted—and maintained his point—that it was part of the waters of a neutral power. The Suez Canal is not internationalized, but is under the control of the power that controls Egypt. It is this kind of control, we take it, that America intends to exercise.

What we suppose will happen is something of this kind; Congress will refuse to vote money to be used anywhere except in United States territory, and accordingly a narrow strip of land on each side of the proposed waterway will be granted by Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I trust the Senator from Oregon will pardon a suggestion at this point to emphasize the point now being made by him. In the Spanish-American War the Spanish fleet was denied passage through the Suez Canal—emphasizing the point that the policy of neutralization was not obligatory upon those who were controlling it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true; and I will show a little later that they not only denied her that right, but they denied vessels of commerce that right, with gunboats at either end of the canal. I will show that by the report made to the United States Government by Admiral Goodrich, who was sent over at the time of the trouble between Great Britain and Egypt.

It is humiliating, Mr. President, to hear distinguished men in the Senate appeal to us to adopt a different policy with reference to the exercise of our rights at Panama from the policy enforced by Great Britain at Suez, when practically the same treaty stipulations govern in both cases. We know, and everybody who knows anything knows, that France and her citizens built the Suez Canal, and that they had hardly gotten their spades out of the ground before Great Britain, by a small investment, got possession of it or practical control of it, for you do not have to have the majority of stock in any institution to control it. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] knows that less than half of the stock in a big railroad corporation usually gives the control. Why? Because the stockholders are so scattered they never can get their holdings together and vote them as a unit. So it was that Great Britain obtained the absolute control of the Suez Canal and has it now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That would be especially true when England owns 176,602 shares out of 379,421 shares and is the most dominant naval power in the world.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This fact gives potency to her ownership and to her influence over the Suez Canal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I agree with the Senator.

Now, let us see what this British authority said. The Spectator continues:

If this is the plan ultimately adopted, there will, of course, be no need of a protectorate treaty with Nicaragua. The canal will be made in United States territory.

We come now to the practical side of the question. What answer are we to make to America if, or rather when, she asks us to agree to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It has been suggested that we should ask for compensation elsewhere or try to make a bargain for trade facilities. Possibly the plan might succeed, but we confess we dislike such huckstering between nations, especially when they involve demands upon a nation's internal fiscal policy. We hold that it would not only be more dignified, but also more beneficial to us in the long run, to ask for no payment for giving up what has as a matter of fact proved merely a sort of double-barreled agreement by England and America to play dog in the manger to each other.

Mr. President, was there ever a prediction that came nearer fulfillment than that, except that we did not attempt to acquire the right to construct a canal through Nicaragua or Costa Rica, but we acquired territory of our own through a treaty with Panama?

This was a fair reflection of the views of the British press and public prior to the passage of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. What the Spectator suggested actually came to pass; to this extent, however, that the United States did acquire a strip of land in Panama over a territory which was not a part of Central America, nor in the minds of any of the parties either to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The canal is, as a matter of fact, built in United States territory and entirely outside the limits of Central America or any part of it, as has been so clearly proven by the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] in his address to the Senate.

I am undertaking to prove by British authority that there has never been any neutralization of the Suez Canal. Great Britain controls Egypt, and through Egypt controls that canal and does with it as she pleases, using it for warlike purposes on occasion and hampering the commerce of other nations when she sees fit; and yet we find the advocates of the cause of Great Britain in the Senate of the United States insisting that if we do not accord to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations the same rights which we exercise ourselves with reference to our coastwise commerce we are violating the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which provides for neutralization along the lines of the convention of Constantinople.

When Arabi Pasha, the Islamite chief, revolted in 1882 he was asked to define his position with reference to the Suez Canal, and he replied:

As I scrupulously respect the neutrality of the canal, especially in consideration of its being so remarkable a work, * * * I have the honor to inform you that the Egyptian Government will not violate that neutrality except at the last extremity, and only in case of the English having committed some act of hostility at Ismailia, Port Said, or some other point of the canal.

He little knew the power or the purposes of Great Britain at that time, Mr. President. He understood what the laws of neutrality meant and was ready to observe the stipulations of the convention with reference to other nations, but in August, 1882, Great Britain took possession of the Suez Canal, tied up the shipping, and put a gunboat at each end, landing her troops and munitions of war from the canal itself, violating in express terms the stipulations as to neutrality. And, Mr. President, she owns now fortifications at either end of this waterway, notwithstanding her profession of an intent to see that that canal was neutralized. Now, see what Admiral C. F. Goodrich, of the United States Navy, has to say on the subject. He was detailed by our Government to go there to watch the progress of events at the canal, and in due course reported to the Secretary of the Navy. If Senators have not read his report they ought to do so. It is quite a large volume, and gives in detail the whole situation as he found it while Great Britain was engaged in her warlike operations in the canal itself. He says:

The English admiral at Suez informs the company's chief traffic agent that in consequence of orders from his Government he forbids, until the receipt of further orders, any ship, large or small, even the company's boats, to enter the canal, and he will resort to force to prevent any attempt to contravene these orders. The admiral, moreover, has placed a gunboat at the mouth of the canal. I have protested against this act of violence and spoliation. * * *

And yet, Mr. President, we have distinguished Senators on this floor insisting that we should neutralize the Panama Canal along the lines laid down in the Constantinople Convention of 1888. That was Great Britain's method of neutralization—stationing a gunboat at the mouth of the canal and ignoring the protests of a distinguished admiral of the United States Navy, who went over there to see the course of operations. Now, note what he further says—and this is his conclusion after having gone into the matter at length and having seen the methods of operation of Great Britain over there:

The inference to Americans is obvious that the neutrality of any canal joining waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans will be maintained, if at all, by the nation which can place and keep the strongest ships at each extremity.

And yet we have Senators in this body and Members in the other branch of Congress who would not have fortified the Panama Canal for its protection. Admiral Goodrich very properly says that its neutrality will be maintained and the canal will be kept open by the Government that has the strongest ships for the purpose of its protection.

Does neutralization provided for in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty mean the same sort of neutralization that is observed by Great Britain in the use of the Suez Canal? Certainly no other neutralization can be inferred or contended for, because the Hay-Pauncefote treaty expressly refers to the convention of Constantinople; and yet we are appealed to by those who plead the cause of Great Britain in the Senate of the United States that our national honor is involved in this alleged violation of treaty stipulations.

As to the second proposition, I call attention to the fact that the treaty of 1815 between the United States and Great Britain provided, amongst other things, that—

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of his Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have heard it said that Great Britain does not pay the same tolls for her ships through the Suez Canal that are paid by other nations. I should like to know whether the Senator from Oregon has looked into that subject?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say that I have not, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall not interrupt the Senator from Oregon now by going into it; it may not be material, but I think that upon investigation it will be found that she discriminates in favor of herself very markedly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, it is a fact undisputed and indisputable that Great Britain is paying a subsidy to the chief lines that go through the canal that amounts to at least two-thirds of the canal dues.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and Russia is doing the same thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Russia pays the entire canal tolls; so does Sweden; so do one or two other nations; and France, in her recent 25-year contract with the Messageries Maritime Co., guarantees to pay the entire dues.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I had not in mind the subsidies that are granted by Great Britain or Russia or any other country to their shipping. I had in mind the terms of the original convention made by Egypt for the building of the Suez Canal. However, I will await another opportunity to discuss that question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Notwithstanding this provision it has been the settled policy of Great Britain, as well as of the United States and all other maritime powers, to treat the word "vessels" as not including those engaged in the coastwise trade. It is a well-known fact that the United States has discriminated against Great Britain for a hundred years in the matter of the coastwise trade, and does so to-day, and Great Britain has likewise discriminated against the vessels of the United States in matters affecting her coastwise trade for the same length of time, and does so to-day, and this notwithstanding the express terms of the treaty of 1815. Is a different construction now to be placed upon the word "vessels" as used in the treaty of 1815? Are we not to be allowed to discriminate in favor of our coastwise vessels when the same policy is pursued to-day by Great Britain in reference to her coastwise vessels? What reason or excuse is there for permitting the treaty of 1815 to receive one construction and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 another? The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) has expressly held that a law of Texas which permitted a greater rate of pilotage charges to be made against British vessels than was imposed upon American vessels was not in violation of the treaty of 1815, and I have no doubt that the same rule would be applied by the same court with reference to the toll exemption at the Panama Canal, because that canal, built upon American territory, with American money, and by American ingenuity, is a part of our coast line, and the exemption is intended to affect only the domestic commerce of the United States. As a matter of fact, the construction placed upon the word "vessels" as used in all treaty stipulations is an international construction, and the instances are rare where it will be found that any exception has ever been made in favor of coastwise vessels, because it is assumed that all treaties will receive the same construction and the word "vessels" will not be held to apply to any other than those engaged in over-sea traffic.

One remarkable thing about the position which some of the Senators on this side of the Chamber have taken is that they based their vote for toll exemption in 1912 on the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, relying upon it as laying down the rule that the treaty of 1815 was not violated by the pilotage exemption of American coastwise vessels, and yet they are willing now to reverse their former positions and to claim that notwithstanding that decision the toll-exemption clause of 1912 is a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The construction which the Supreme Court of the United States placed upon the rights of this country with reference to coastwise trade in the case of Olsen against Smith is the same construction that has been placed upon the treaty by Great Britain ever since its adoption, and it has been put into actual practice by that country in its treatment of American vessels.

In the November, 1912, issue of the Law Magazine and Review, of London, there are two ably written arguments in favor of the toll-exemption clause in the act of 1912, one written by Mr. Edward S. Cox-Sinclair, in which he sums up his argument by stating:

(a) That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty, that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and that its case is difficult to challenge on grounds of general justice;

(b) That there is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process of arbitration; and

(c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate, an impartial, and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The other article is by Mr. C. A. Hereshoff Bartlett, in which he says, among other things:

If England's interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty holds good, then how does she justify, under the language just quoted of the treaty of 1815, her discrimination in tonnage duties in favor of her coasting vessels? And yet this is precisely what she has always done and is doing to-day. No explanation or recrimination can alter the fact that Great Britain has always adhered tenaciously, like other sea-girt nations, to the policy of favoring coastwise vessels, and that wherever Britannia rules they form a class separate and distinct from vessels employed in foreign trade, and that they have always been excepted from the term "vessels" as used in all international agreements. So true is this that it would seem unnecessary to go into details, although abundant proof is at hand.

Take, for instance, the port of Bristol. Every vessel entering from or departing for the east coast of the United States of America, including ports of the United States of America in the Gulf of Mexico, pays 1s. 1½d. per register ton, while every vessel entering or departing for the Channel Islands, Ireland, the Isle of Man, or any part of Great Britain, not including Barry, Penarth, Cardiff, Newport, and other ports to the eastward of the Holmes, pays only 5d. per registered ton.

From a comparison of the foregoing port charges it appears that an American vessel of 5,000 tons on entering or departing from the port of Bristol from or for the east coast of America pays tonnage dues at the rate of 28 cents per ton, or 56 cents for entering and departing, while vessels entering or departing for the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man, or any part of Great Britain, with a few exceptions, pay only 10 cents a ton, or 20 cents for both entering and departing. At these rates an American vessel of 5,000 tons arriving from overseas is compelled to pay at the port of Bristol on entering or departing $90 tonnage dues, or on entering and departing $180, while if no other or higher duties or charges were imposed than those payable in the same ports on British vessels according to the treaty of 1815, then such American vessel would only have to pay $50 on entering or departing, or $100 on entering and departing, making a difference in the first instance of $40 and in the second of $80. This may not be discrimination according to English views, but it looks exceedingly like it from an American standpoint.

The rates and dues exacted at the port of Liverpool (Mersey docks and harbor board) afford some startling illustrations of this discrimination. Dock tonnage rates on vessels are imposed according to the class of voyage; that is to say, the vessel's destination. Those coming within class 6, which includes all ports on the east coast of North America, pay 1s. 4d. per ton, while those under class 2, between the Mull of Galloway and Duncans Bay Head, including the Orkney Isles and all the islands on the western coast of Scotland, and between St. Davids Head and the Lands End, including the Scilly Island and the east coast of Ireland from Cape Clear to Malling Head, pay 4½d. per ton, and those included in class 3, covering all parts of the east and southern coasts of Great Britain between Duncans Bay Head and the Lands End, including the Islands of Shetland and all parts of the west coast of Ireland from Cape Clear to Malling Head, including the islands on that coast, pay 6d. per ton.

Harbor rates on vessels bear out the same discrimination. Those under class 2 pay five-eighths of a penny per ton; those under class 3 pay three-fourths of a penny per ton; while vessels under class 6, embracing the trans-Atlantic trade, have to pay 1½d. per ton, or exactly double. There are also differential dock tonnage rates on vessels in which the same discrimination is carried out as they provide for one-half of the rates specified under classes 2, 3, and 6.

Wharf rates on vessels are as follows: Under class 2, 1½d. per ton; under class 3, 1½d. per ton; and under class 6, 4d. per ton. This is a clear preference in favor of domestic coasting vessels as against vessels engaged in foreign or over-seas trade of 2½d. per ton.

These figures of the port of Liverpool furnish additional examples of the same rigid discrimination in favor of England's coasting vessels. American vessels coming across seas, for entering and leaving port pay harbor rates of 33 cents a ton, while some coasters pay only 9 cents a ton, or 27 cents per ton less than the American vessel.

Tonnage dues at the port of London are as follows: (1) For every vessel trading coastwise or entering inward or clearing outward from or to any place north of latitude 48° 30′ N., and between longitude 12° W. and 65° E. of Greenwich, for every voyage both in and out, 1d. per ton. (2) For every vessel entering inward or clearing outward beyond those limits, 1½d. per ton. (3) For vessels under 100 tons which do not pass beyond the seaward limit of the port, a halfpenny per ton. (4) Coastwise vessels not exceeding 45 tons, vessels bringing corn coastwise, fishing smacks, and lobster and oyster boats are exempt from dues.

This discrimination of 1 cent a ton for entering and clearing port in favor of coastwise vessels and against trans-Atlantic vessels may on first impression seem trifling; but when on calculation it is found that on a vessel of 5,000 tons this additional 1 cent per ton on entering and leaving port amounts to $50, it is evident that all sense of equality between ocean-going vessels and those employed in the home trade only is completely discarded.

If England for a moment believed that the words "British vessels" or "vessels of the United States" as used in the treaty of 1815 included or was ever intended to include coasting vessels, she would not have established and enforced differential rates at her various ports in favor of coasting vessels, for that would then be a flagrant violation of the rights secured to vessels of the United States under the treaty. Not only this, but such an interpretation on the part of England would afford the United States to justly demand that vessels of the United States pay the same dues and charges at British ports as are exacted from British vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, instead of those largely increased and heavier dues and charges that American vessels have to pay.

But, in addition to this, Great Britain, by assent and ratification under circumstances similar to those that have arisen under the Panama Canal act, is not in a position to now insist on an interpretation of the equality clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty different from that in accordance with the established interpretation she herself has put upon the treaty of 1815 and of like clauses in other treaties.

The second article of the treaty of 1815 is as follows:

"No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels."

This treaty was to be obligatory for four years from its ratification; but it was extended for 10 years by the convention of October 20, 1818, and indefinitely extended by the convention of August 6, 1827, so that it is a subsisting treaty to-day.

It will be seen that the provision above quoted from the treaty of 1815 is as broad and comprehensive as the equality clause contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and that it embraces all vessels of either country without exception or distinction as to whether they may be engaged in over-seas commerce or the coastwise trade. If, therefore, the expressions "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States" do not embrace vessels employed in the coastwise trade as England has herself interpreted the words for nearly a century, it is incomprehensible that she should now pretend in an outburst of indignation that the words "vessels of commerce of all nations" contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty do refer to and include those very vessels that she has always excluded under the terms "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States."

It is an interesting fact not generally known that the provision of the treaty of 1815, to which reference has been made, has been judicially interpreted by the courts of the United States in a litigation ending in a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1904, which declared that a British vessel engaged in foreign commerce was not entitled under the treaty of 1815 to the exemption from paying pilotage accorded by law to American vessels engaged in the coasting trade. In the course of the judgment rendered by Mr. Justice White, he said:

"Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign." (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 344.)

Not only has this interpretation of the treaty of 1815 been adopted and carried into practice by Great Britain for nearly a century, thus giving it the same validity as though a clause excepting coastwise trade had been therein inserted, but England's continued silence and acquiescence and failure to object to a like interpretation by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case cited is in itself an implied ratification and adoption thereof and is equivalent in its consequences to an express declaration of approval.

If, therefore, the words "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States," as used in the treaty of 1815, do not include vessels engaged in the coasting trade, as I feel has been sufficiently demonstrated, it is difficult to understand how the words "vessels of commerce of all nations," as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, do include them.

It will be seen that these distinguished English writers fully justify and sustain the position which Congress took in 1912 in the enactment of the law now sought to be repealed.

Not only is the position of this Government sustained by the actual practice of Great Britain and by other maritime powers in the matter of purely domestic trade, but the contention of Great Britain with reference to treaty violations was practically abandoned by the British Government when the whole subject was opened up again, not by any subject of Great Britain but by the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in a speech which was delivered by him on the 21st day of January, 1913, and this, if current rumor be true, to the amazement and surprise of President Taft and the distinguished Secretary of State, Philander C. Knox, both of the Senator's own party. The latter, in a learned and able reply to the contention of Great Britain, had closed the controversy in his presentation of the American side of the controversy on the 17th day of January, 1913. Since that day, except for arguments that have been made in favor of the contention of Great Britain, in and out of Congress, by men who seem to be more solicitous about the cause of Great Britain than they are about the interests of our own people, so far as Congress is advised, neither Great Britain herself, through her ministers or otherwise, nor any other power, has raised its voice in protest against the act of 1912.

If the United States has not the power, without the violation of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to exempt its vessels of war and of commerce from the payment of tolls, what must be said and done with respect to the provision in the treaty with the Republic of Panama of May 25, 1904, article 19, which provides, amongst other things, that "the Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind"? This provision is a part of the consideration paid by the United States for the Canal Zone. Is that a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Is it possible for us to grant to Panama, without a violation of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, a higher right than that which we claim for ourselves and which it is insisted is in violation of the terms of that treaty? Must that stipulation be disregarded? If so, a part of the consideration for the territory acquired by the United States from the Republic of Panama fails, the treaty falls to the ground, and the immense expenditure made by the United States in the construction of the canal might just as well have been thrown into the sea.

The position of some of my distinguished colleagues on this side of the Chamber in reference to the repeal of the exemption clause in the Panama Canal act is to me most remarkable, in view, not only of the platform adopted at the Baltimore convention, but as well in view of the position which some of them assumed in the discussion of the question after the Baltimore convention and prior to the passage of the act. The following Senators, now Members of this body, were members of the subcommittee of the platform committee at the Baltimore convention, and there may have been other Members of this Senate who were in the convention but who were not on that subcommittee. The State of Arkansas was represented by Senator CLARKE, the State of Indiana by Senator KERN, the State of Mississippi by Senator VARDAMAN, the State of Montana by Senator WALSH, the State of New York by Senator O'GORMAN, the State of Ohio by Senator POMERENE, the State of South Carolina by Senator TILLMAN, the State of Texas by Senator CULBERSON, and the State of Virginia by Senator MARTIN. The resolutions adopted received the unanimous vote of the committee, and all of the resolutions presented to the convention by the committee were unanimously adopted. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who acted as secretary of the committee, has recently given a most instructive account of the adoption of the tolls plank. The declaration in that platform was as follows:

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

It must be remembered that this platform pledge was made prior to the enactment of the law in question.

Not a single Democrat who was present in the Chamber at the time the act of 1912 was agreed to voted against it, nor was it charged at any time by any of them in the course of the discussion that the granting of free tolls to American coastwise vessels was in the nature of a subsidy or in violation of treaty obligations. If any of them thought so, not one, as I now recall, made any argument against it on either ground, and I assume that they either believed that such exemption was authorized by the treaty, or if they did not they were disposed to follow the platform declaration and the declared policy of the party, right or wrong, rather than follow their own convictions.

What has caused that change of heart which has induced some of my colleagues to completely change front, ignore the platform of 1912, and reverse the position which was taken by them in the convention as well as that taken when they voted for the exemption clause in the Senate? They are all distinguished and able gentlemen, and I assume were as thoroughly advised then as to what a subsidy really was and as to what "our national honor" demanded of us as they are at this late date, and yet we find some of them giving as a reason for the reversal of their position that the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is a subsidy granted to a shipping monopoly, and are basing their contention for repeal upon the alleged fact that the granting of subsidies is opposed to another clause in the Democratic platform as well as to the general policy of the party.

The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], in an address delivered in the Senate on the 7th day of August, 1912, said, amongst other things:

> I think we may justly insist—I doubt whether it would be successfully controverted—that so far as our coastwise vessels are concerned this treaty does not apply to them. Indeed, in the communication from the Attorney General embodying the views brought to our attention by Great Britain it is stated that upon that subject with proper regulations it is probable that no question by Great Britain would be made. Now, fortifying that view, one that we can logically deduce from article 3, section 1, and the attitude of Great Britain upon it with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Galveston case, in which they held, in effect, that language of this kind was not applicable to coastwise vessels, that it was no discrimination under language practically similar to the language found in this treaty to extend privileges to coastwise vessels that were not extended to foreign vessels, we can sustain the provision freeing coastwise vessels from tolls. That decision squarely sustains the position that the treaty does not apply to coastwise vessels. I do not express an opinion as to its application to foreign vessels, but if I were engaged in the practice and were about to be employed on one of two sides I would vastly prefer to help the side that it does apply to American vessels engaged in foreign trade. I think, however, we are justified in the conclusion, especially in view of the further fact that nearly every nation handles its coastwise business exclusively in vessels of its own, that this treaty did not mean to apply to coastwise vessels. The language used expresses no discrimination as to nations; it expresses no discrimination as to English vessels or French vessels or German vessels; it simply declares that the coastwise vessels may pass through the canal free. Our statutes, like the laws of most other countries, limit the coastwise trade to American vessels. I think we can safely rely upon this decision and the construction to justify the conclusion that we do not invade the terms of the treaty if we permit coastwise vessels to pass through the canal free. I apprehend that no possible question would be raised upon it, unless it were that the effect under the treaty would be to give coastwise vessels of Canada and British America the same privilege.

The Senator did express some doubt as to certain of our obligations under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but notwithstanding the fact that an amendment proposed by him was voted down, he nevertheless voted for the provision as it was finally adopted. The distinguished Senator has completely changed front on the question, as evidenced by an address delivered in the Senate a few days since.

You know, Mr. President, it is not entirely pleasant to put what Senators are saying now in opposition to what they said only a brief two years ago; but you must remember that there are only a few Democrats on this side of the Chamber who are going to be in opposition to this repeal proposition, and we want to use the arguments that our colleagues made two years ago to sustain us in our position. It helps out some before the country, anyhow. What they said then is just as applicable now as when they voted for exemption.

The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who now takes the position, if I understand that position correctly, that the act not only violates the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but is objectionable on the further ground that it is in the nature of a subsidy to shipowners, at the time the act was under consideration in the Senate in 1912, said, amongst other things:

> I shall vote for the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States upon the ground laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Olsen against Smith, in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, that ground being, in short, that as foreign vessels never had any standing in the coastwise trade at all, any provisions with regard to the coastwise trade can not be a discrimination. It is clear to anybody who can read English that, whether this treaty ought to do it or ought not to do it, this treaty does forbid us to make any discrimination. The Senator from Iowa tells us that other powers will make discriminations by granting their vessels rebates equal to their tolls. Whenever they do, that moment we have the right, under the treaty itself, to put ourselves upon a ground of equality with them by making an equal rebate.
> I agree with the Senator that if we have no right to make a direct discrimination we have no right to make an indirect discrimination by making rebates; but if other nations do it, as he freely predicts that they will, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] freely predicts that they will, then in order to reinaugurate the equality itself, which is the object of the treaty, we would have the right to do it.

The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], who will now vote for a repeal of the clause, delivered an address at the time it was under consideration, eloquently pleaded for toll exemption, and on the 6th of August, 1912, said, amongst other things:

As for myself, I had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the United States had under the terms of the treaty the undoubted right to exempt from the payment of tolls all American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

* * * * * * *

Now, it is well known that at the time of this treaty the ships of no other nation were permitted to do business in the coastwise trade of the United States, and that is the law still, and certainly it can not be abrogated by this treaty.

It follows, then, that as no foreign ship can operate in our coastwise trade and compete with us in that trade we are not discriminating against such ships by allowing to our own coastwise ships the free use of the canal.

These were the views I expressed in the committee sessions, as will appear by the printed report of the proceedings, and I voted in accordance with them.

But when it came to the proposition of giving free passage to American ships engaged in the foreign trade a different condition prevailed, for foreign ships using the canal might compete with our own ships in the foreign trade, and free tolls to our own ships might be a discrimination against the ships of other nations.

This view I also expressed during the committee sessions, as will appear by the report, and for that reason I declined to vote on the question, stating to the committee that I wished further time to consider it, a statement in which I was joined, as I now remember, by one other member of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

And as I was in doubt then, candor to the Senate and to myself as well compels me to say that I am in some doubt still on this particular question, though I am reluctant to admit that I have been unable to come to a positive opinion on the pure question of law presented.

However, I have concluded that I would be justified in resolving my doubt in favor of the interest of the people of the United States, and shall accordingly vote to allow the free passage through the canal of all American ships.

The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who has recently made a speech in favor of repeal, was thoroughly committed both by remarks on the floor of the Senate and by his vote on this particular clause in the act of 1912, and yet he now favors repeal because, as he alleges, we have shown to the world that our construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in 1912 was correct, but that he is now convinced that exemption means a subsidy to a shipping monopoly, and he will vote for repeal. He said, amongst other things in 1912, on this very subject:

I am more concerned about the interpretation to be placed by the Government of Great Britain and other foreign governments upon the action of the Senate as it relates to the right of the United States to control this canal and to exercise absolute sovereign jurisdiction over it, even to the extent of permitting any vessel of American registry to go through without the payment of tolls, than I am about the temporary policy, whether it be of one line or the other. I would dislike to have Congress take such action as would be in effect a congressional interpretation of the treaty to the extent that we ourselves in Congress denied the right of this Government to use the canal in the way indicated if this Government saw proper to do so.

Then, to avoid the opposition very likely, indeed almost certain, to arise from the notion that to pay tolls is a form of subsidy and furnishing a precedent, it may be, for additional subsidies in the future, why not provide at once that all American vessels shall go through without the payment of tolls?

The RECORD will disclose that the Senator had a standing pair and changed that pair when a final vote was to be taken in order that he might vote for the exemption clause.

I have only called attention to those of my colleagues who advocated toll exemption in 1912, and who now state that they intend to vote for repeal. I do not intend to pay to my colleagues the poor compliment of saying that at the time they voted for toll exemption they did not understand the meaning of the act as thoroughly as they understand it now, and I shall await with interest the explanations made by other Senators who voted for the exemption clause and who may later determine to vote for its repeal, whether on the ground that the national honor is involved or on the ground that it is the granting of a subsidy to a shipping monopoly.

I do not intend to charge any Senator with insincerity in his present course, but I do charge that our party went to the country in 1912 on this amongst other issues, and our candidates were triumphantly elected, and that the change of front on the part of some of the leaders of the party and the vote of Congress to repeal the toll-exemption clause will rise to plague them in the next campaign; and why should it not, Mr. President?

I am frank to say that I have stood with the administration in some instances when I felt it was measurably against the interests of some of the people of my State to do so; but I did it because the members of all parties had promised to revise the tariff downward, and I could not afford, as a single individual, to stand out and defeat a great measure because some particular interest in my State was involved. Therefore I stood loyally by the administration in everything it attempted to do; but here is a question when no particular individual interest of my State is involved. Our national life, it seems to me, is wrapped up in it. It is a matter of conscience, not a matter of individual interest.

I desire to say that the question was discussed in my State and in the West generally by those who pleaded for Democratic success as well as by those who advocated the cause of the Progressive Republicans. Inasmuch as the position of President Taft's administration was thoroughly understood on the subject, some of the speakers who advocated his election simply explained that the position of the then administration was so thoroughly understood that it was unnecessary even to refer to the matter; and this was true.

The remarkable thing about the situation is that some of the Senators on this side of the Chamber who have been sticklers for the observation of platform pledges, who have, in season and out of season, been ready to denounce those who showed occasionally a disposition to depart from these pledges as traitors to party and people, are ready now themselves to depart from these pledges and to reverse positions which were taken by them less than two years ago on a question which affects the very life of the Republic.

WILL TOLLS EXEMPTION BENEFIT ANY SHIPPING TRUST?

The insistence, Mr. President, that the exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is a violation of any of our treaty stipulations leads to so many absurdities and contradictions it is not to be wondered at that many of our friends on this side of the Chamber, at least, have practically abandoned that insistence and now undertake to justify themselves for taking a position inconsistent with their course in voting for the act of August 24, 1912, by claiming that the exemption provided for by the act in question would result in the establishment of a shipping monopoly or trust; and I desire to address myself briefly to that branch of the subject.

It is a well-known fact that there has been a shipping monopoly on both the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards for years past. The testimony taken before the Interoceanic Canals Committee in 1912 discloses beyond any question that there was. The voluminous report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives, made to Congress in 1913, proves conclusively that there was and is such a monopoly.

The evidence before the former committee disclosed not only that there was a monopoly, but that those who were interested in maintaining it had used every means at their command for more than a quarter of a century to defeat the construction of a canal connecting the two oceans, as well as to control the railways across the Isthmus. That monopoly was owned, maintained, and operated under the beneficent influences of the transcontinental railways, whose agents and emissaries have always been on hand to adduce arguments to show the economic unwisdom either of canal construction or tolls exemption. They were before the Interoceanic Canals Committee in force, making all sorts of objections to tolls exemptions and all sorts of promises if such exemptions were not allowed. Having failed in their efforts to defeat the act of 1912, I think it would not be very difficult to discover their fine Italian hand in legislation which looks to the repeal of the exemption clause in the act referred to. Having failed before Congress, they have quietly but, it seems, effectively entered the field of diplomacy. With what success will soon be determined by the vote of the Senate on the proposed repeal.

Admitting, therefore, that there exists to-day a shipping monopoly or trust, and insisting that it is owned and controlled by the transcontinental and other railroads of the country, what is to become of it as soon as the Panama Canal is opened under the act which it is now sought to repeal; and what is to become of any attempted organization of a monopoly or trust on the part of shipowners under the terms of this very act? The answer to those who make this insistence about a shipping trust is contained in the act of 1912 itself, which is the greatest piece of antitrust legislation that has ever been enacted by Congress.

Section 11 of the act absolutely prohibits the passage through the canal of any ship owned or operated by a railroad or in which it has any interest, and the questions involved in such ownership and in the matter of competition are left to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This provision of the act completely destroys a shipping monopoly which has been maintained for many years by the transcontinental and other railroads of the country. There could be no more effective destruction of an existing monopoly than is provided by the act in question.

I call attention to what the Senator from New York said yesterday in reference to this. The Senator from New York said that American coastwise traffic passing through the canal was not entirely coastwise traffic, as I understood him; that it was not coastwise traffic at all; and yet the Congress of the United States has taken issue with the Senator in that respect, and has passed an act which expressly says that it is, and has placed the vessels going through the canal and engaged in this traffic under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, who is right?

It may be said, however, that the destruction of the existing monopoly opens the way for the establishment of another, and that is the contention made in some quarters. It assumes that those who may now be considered as independent shipowners will simply take the place that has heretofore been occupied by the steamship lines owned and operated by the transcontinental lines, and that they will add to any fleet that they may now have engaged in the coastwise traffic, and unite to form another shipping monopoly.

The act in question completely answers this contention as well as the first, for it specifically provides that no vessel which is permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall be permitted to use the canal, if it is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company doing business in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and other statutes which have for their purpose the destruction of monopoly. The Interstate Commerce Commission is given jurisdiction over these vessels, as well as over railroad-owned ships, so that it will be a physical impossibility either for the transcontinental railways to maintain longer a shipping monopoly or that such monopoly shall be established or maintained by any other vessels after the canal is opened, no matter by whom owned.

What more conclusive answer to the contention that the exemption from tolls will result in the establishment of a shipping monopoly engaged in the coastwise trade? I request that section 11 of the Panama Canal act, approved August 24, 1912, may be published as a part of this address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be of the opinion that any such existing specified service by water other than through the Panama Canal is being operated in the interest of the public and is of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that such extension will neither exclude, prevent, nor reduce competition on the route by water under consideration, the Interstate Commerce Commission may, by order, extend the time during which such service by water may continue to be operated beyond July 1, 1914. In every case of such extension the rates, schedules, and practices of such water carrier shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and shall be subject to the act to regulate commerce and all amendments thereto in the same manner and to the same extent as is the railroad or other common carrier controlling such water carrier or interested in any manner in its operation: Provided, Any application for extension under the terms of this provision filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission prior to July 1, 1914, but for any reason not heard and disposed of before said date, may be considered and granted thereafter.

No vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall be permitted to enter or pass through said canal if such ship is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company which is doing business in violation of the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or the provisions of sections 73 to 77, both inclusive, of an act approved August 27, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," or the provisions of any other act of Congress amending or supplementing the said act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act, and amendments thereto, or said sections of the act of August 27, 1894. The question of fact may be determined by the judgment of any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in any cause pending before it to which the owners or operators of such ships are parties. Suit may be brought by any shipper or by the Attorney General of the United States.

That section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"When property may be or is transported from point to point in the United States by rail and water through the Panama Canal or otherwise, the transportation being by a common carrier or carriers, and not entirely within the limits of a single State, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have jurisdiction of such transportation and of the carriers, both by rail and by water, which may or do engage in the same, in the following particulars, in addition to the jurisdiction given by the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910:

"(a) To establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constructed from the dock to the limits of its right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carrier a spur track or tracks to the dock. This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable, can be made with safety to the public, and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay.

"The commission shall have full authority to determine the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracks, when constructed, shall be operated, and it may, either in the construction or the operation of such tracks, determine what sum shall be paid to or by either carrier. The provisions of this paragraph shall extend to cases where the dock is owned by other parties than the carrier involved.

"(b) To establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail and water lines, and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced.

"(c) To establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought or from which it is taken by the water carrier and to determine to what traffic and in connection with what vessels and upon what terms and conditions such rates shall apply. By proportional rates are meant those which differ from the corresponding local rates to and from the port and which apply only to traffic which has been brought to the port or is carried from the port by a common carrier by water.

"(d) If any rail carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Interstate Commerce Commission may require such railway to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country."

The orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to this section shall only be made upon formal complaint or in proceedings instituted by the commission of its own motion and after full hearing. The orders provided for in the two amendments to the act to regulate commerce enacted in this section shall be served in the same manner and enforced by the same penalties and proceedings as are the orders of the commission made under the provisions of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910, and they may be conditioned for the payment of any sum or the giving of security for the payment of any sum or the discharge of any obligation which may be required by the terms of said order.

IS THE EXEMPTION FROM TOLLS A SUBSIDY?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The question then arises, Is the exemption of American vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic a subsidy?

Mr. President, if I may indulge, like the Spectator in London, in a little prophecy and prediction, I am going to make one right now.

In all human probability the Panama tolls-exemption clause is going to be repealed. I hope not, but I fear it will be. That is simply the first step toward the creation of a monopoly that will be the greatest that ever existed in this country. I will tell you what the next step will be, and this is the prophecy:

As soon as we repeal this act the same powers and forces that have been at work for a quarter of a century trying to prevent the construction of the canal will be at work undertaking to get the Congress of the United States to repeal the portion of the act of 1912 which refuses to railroad-owned ships access to the canal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The proposition which the Senator from Oregon has made is an interesting one, and it stands to reason that we shall have to face that situation. The claim will be made that foreign steamships owned by railroads are given access to the canal, but we are preventing our own railroad-owned ships from entering the canal, and the argument will be pretty conclusive in the minds of many people.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Indeed, it will be. There is not any question about that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Where is the machinery of the American Government located that can investigate or determine the legal status or the ownership of foreign ships? Certainly there is no law here, and we can not make a law, that would give us the right to enter into any foreign State to inquire into the ownership of her merchant vessels.

The singular anomaly is here presented that we impose an absolute inhibition against railroad-owned ships passing through the canal under the American flag, and yet permit railroad-owned ships operating under the British flag to enjoy that privilege. Anyone in this Chamber who is at all familiar with the commerce and shipping of Canada knows that the large part of her commerce is carried in ships that are owned by subsidiary companies which are controlled by her railroads.

Mr. President, I think that Canada is at the very bottom of this repeal agitation. Her attitude toward that inhibition has stirred up all the trouble we are now encountering in England. The Canadian premier, Mr. Borden, took the ship for London almost immediately after this restriction was placed in the statute, and the moment he arrived in England we could see a new activity among British officials against an exemption of our coastwise ships from tolls and for an official interpretation of the clause against railroad-owned ships being permitted to navigate the canal. In the name of Heaven, who built this canal? Who must sustain and defend it? What Government must maintain its neutrality in time of war or deal out justice to its patrons in time of peace? The United States of America, of course; and its people should have sovereign rights therein for all the future generations of our countrymen.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's suggestion, I will say that I suppose if a ship presents herself at the canal, presents a foreign registry and the proper certificates and proofs, she goes through upon payment of the tolls, and that is all there is to it. I do not see how we can stop them. I have my doubts about the jurisdiction of any tribunal in the United States to determine whether or not Canadian-owned ships are railroad owned or not. I do not see how we are going to prevent them from going through the canal, and that is the appeal that is going to be made by the American transcontinental railroads. It will be said that we are permitting their opponents and competitors to go through the canal, and yet are denying the same privilege to them; and that will be the next step without any question of a doubt. A little later on I am going to show what Canada thinks about the situation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does not the very condition of affairs of which the Senator speaks show that, as a matter of fact, if we follow out the theory that this law is in contravention of the treaty, there is already a discrimination against the citizens of the United States and in favor of those of foreign countries?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir; there is no question about it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And therefore we are violating the terms of the treaty in that respect?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir. I may say to the Senator that we are violating it in some other ways, too; and yet the partisans of Great Britain are willing to permit those violations. It is all right to violate it sometimes, and it is all wrong to violate it at other times.

Mr. President, is the exemption of American vessels engaged in coastwise traffic a subsidy? The word "subsidy" seems to frighten some Democrats more than any other in the English language. Now, let us see if it is.

It has been the policy of the Government, no matter what political party happened to be in control, for more than a hundred years to exempt from tolls all vessels engaged in domestic commerce. There has been expended in the improvement of our rivers, harbors, and lakes, and in the canalization of such rivers and streams as would not be susceptible of navigation without such canalization, $709,019,093.65 from the establishment of the Government to the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913. This is exclusive of the Panama Canal. The total sum expended is nearly twice as much as has been expended for the Panama Canal. It has been the settled policy of the National as well as State Governments at all times to abolish tolls and do away with the toll keeper wherever it has been possible to do so, and there has not been a session of Congress, I venture to say, in the last hundred years when some bill was not up for consideration which had for its purpose the purchase from private interests, corporate and others, of canals which under their charters were permitted to levy tolls upon the commerce of the country. It has been the settled policy of the Government to purchase these canals and to relieve such commerce from burdens so imposed, just as it has been the policy of the several States of the Union to do away with the earlier policy of permitting tolls to be charged on the public highways.

That has been the Democratic policy too, Mr. President, to abolish the gatekeeper, the tollkeeper, the man who levies tribute upon the commerce of the country.

The reasons for this policy are obvious, for whenever title is acquired and the toll charge removed two things are accomplished: First, commerce is to that extent relieved of a burden; and, second, a competitor is established against traffic by railroad, rates are reduced, and an artificial regulator of rates established. The Panama Canal is a part of the coast line; it is on lands the title to which is just as entirely vested in the United States as is the title to the lands under St. Marys or the Mississippi River. Domestic commerce is to be carried through the canal exempted from the payment of tolls, just as it is to be carried through the Sault Ste. Marie or any other canals along our waterways. Is a different rule to be applied to the Panama Canal from that which has applied to other waterways which have been acquired by the Government and maintained at an enormous annual expense; and if so, what reason can be found for the establishment of a different rule other than the alleged violation of a treaty? Will not the Panama Canal serve just as effectively as a regulator of transcontinental rates and serve to reduce those rates just as effectively as a canal on the Mississippi River will serve to regulate and reduce rail rates along that river? That the improvement of the Mississippi River has that effect nobody questions.

I think the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] will know that wherever the Mississippi River comes in competition with rail it has the effect immediately to reduce the rates on cotton and other commodities. It has been established beyond the peradventure of a doubt. Otherwise the Congress of the United States has been most improvident in the expenditure of the people's money.

As reaffirming and effectually establishing the policy of exemption from tolls to vessels engaged in domestic commerce, the river and harbor appropriation act of 1884 provided as follows:

> No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed.

Why does not that act apply to the Panama Canal? Because that territory was acquired after the passage of the act of 1884? Are we going to repeal the act of 1912, which is in line with the act of 1884? Shall we repeal both?

Exemption has always been a well-established governmental policy. I might call attention in detail to the canals which have been acquired or constructed by the United States, the cost of each, and the amount of traffic that passes annually through each without the payment of tolls, all of which are maintained at the expense of the General Government, but I do not deem it necessary to do so. As an illustration, however, I call attention to the canals and improvements through St. Marys River, connecting Lakes Superior and Huron, which have cost the Government $19,837,441.91, for which an annual maintenance charge is provided by the Government. No tolls are charged on any vessels passing through this canal, and yet, beginning with 1881, when 1,567,741 tons of freight passed through it, there has been a steady annual increase in such freight. During the year ending 1913, 19,165,000 tons net register passed through the Suez Canal, as compared with 57,989,715 tons net register which went through the St. Marys River; in other words, the traffic of the Soo Canal for the year 1913 was almost three times as much as that which went through the Suez Canal. It has been estimated by Prof. Emory Johnson that the probable tonnage of the Panama Canal in 1915 would be 10,500,000 tons net register, and in 1925, 17,000,000 tons net register. It will thus be seen that the tonnage through the Soo Canal is more than three times as much as that which is likely to be the tonnage through the Panama Canal 10 years from the opening of the canal. If only 10 cents per ton net register were charged for freight passing through the Soo Canal it would yield to the Government nearly $5,800,000 annually, and if the same rate as is proposed at the Panama Canal were charged there it would net to the Government $72,500,000 annually.

Senators talk about the toll exemption at Panama being for the benefit of a shipping monopoly! Let us see what has been taking place at the Soo Canal ever since it has been owned and operated by the Government at an enormous expense, which is appropriated annually by the votes of Senators and Representatives who are now so fearful of doing something to benefit the so-called shipping monopoly, and so opposed to granting anything in the nature of a subsidy, whether directly or indirectly, to the Shipping Trust.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives in its report, volume 4, page 317, et seq., after a most exhaustive examination into the subject, find that while there are numerous independent steamship lines operated locally on the Great Lakes, the through traffic from the western gateway on the Lakes, such as Chicago and Duluth, to the eastern seaports via Buffalo, is controlled exclusively by six boat lines owned by the trunk line railroads connecting the East and the Central West. These six lines are the Erie Railroad Transit Line, owned and operated by the Erie Railroad Co.; the Erie and Western Transportation Co., operating between Buffalo and Duluth and Buffalo and Chicago, controlled by the Pennsylvania Railroad and Northern Central Railway Cos.; the Lehigh Valley Transportation Co., operating between Buffalo and Chicago, and owned by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; the Mutual Transit Co., operating between Buffalo and Duluth, and owned by the Mutual Terminal Co. of Buffalo, the stock of which company is owned jointly by the New York Central, the Lehigh Valley, the Erie, and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Cos.; the Rutland Transit Co., operating between Ogdensburg and Buffalo and Chicago, and owned by the Rutland Railroad Co., which is owned by the New York Central and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Cos.; and the Western Transit Co., operating between Buffalo and Duluth and Buffalo and Chicago, and owned by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co.

The names of the steamship lines, the number of vessels, the tonnage, and the nature of the railroad control is gone into at length in the report referred to, and I invite the attention of the Senate to it in confirmation of what I have to say upon this subject. In other words, the immense tonnage which passes through the Soo Canal, exceeding greatly the total tonnage of the Suez and Panama Canals combined, is controlled entirely by railway lines, many of which, operating the steamship lines in connection with their parallel railway lines, fix the rates to suit themselves, both by water and rail.

This immense tonnage, which is three times as much as the tonnage which goes through the Suez Canal or will go through the Panama Canal in 1925, is carried by ships owned by six railway companies in this country. Yet Senators talk about this exemption from tolls in Panama being in the interests of a shipping monopoly and of a shipping trust. Mr. President, I can explain it in no other way than to express the fear that Senators have not read the report of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, or they never would make such a statement as that. If they will refer to that report, they will find that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and other transcontinental railway lines not only control a large part of the traffic on the Great Lakes, but they have traffic arrangements with trans-Pacific steamers operating between Japanese ports and Liverpool. There is not any question about that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is it not true that the influence, at least indirect, of all these railroads that are using this canal, which is being operated at Government expense, is now being exerted against the exemption of tolls on similar traffic through the Panama Canal?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; there is no doubt about it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is it not a fact that the Panama Canal is the only waterway in the United States that is absolutely protected from monopoly?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is the only one.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have undertaken to show that, I will say to the Senator, and I do not think there is any question of doubt about it; and I make this prediction: That if we repeal the act at this session of Congress, the next step would be to permit railroad-owned ships to go through the canal and reestablish a monopoly which is now abolished.

The same situation is disclosed in a report made by Mr. Luther Conant, jr., Commissioner of Corporations, on the 23d of December, 1912, to the Department of Commerce and Labor, and to this I invite the attention of the Senate as showing that the immense expenditures of the Government at the Soo Canal, at which no tolls are charged, is really more of a subsidy to a shipping monopoly than the exemption of tolls at Panama can possibly be, even if section 11 of the act of 1912 did not prevent both railroad-owned ships or ships combining in violation of the terms of the Sherman Antitrust Act from passing through the canal, thus making monopoly an impossibility.

What is said with reference to the Soo Canal is entirely true with practically all of the waterways of this country which are utilized for our domestic commerce. The reports to which I call attention show that the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, the Mississippi River system, the Pacific coast, and the canal systems of the country are practically dominated by the railway systems, enabling them to fix such rates by rail as to practically put the waterway systems out of commission.

It is to be hoped that under the powers which are now conferred under the Interstate Commerce Commission this intolerable situation may soon be terminated.

The reports to which I have called attention disclose that beyond any question of doubt, upon every single waterway upon which the Congress of the United States has been expending money for years past the freight is controlled by railroad companies; that is, the great bulk of the freight which is handled. Not only do they own the transportation facilities on water, but the railroad companies in this country practically own all the terminal facilities, which imposes even a greater hardship. It was disclosed in the Alaska discussion here that certain interests in Alaska had control of the terminal facilities and would not let an independent line land their boats for the purpose of unloading freight without the payment of exorbitant charges, and that the same condition exists everywhere. People in my own city within the last two years have voted a tax on themselves of $500,000 for the purpose of acquiring docking facilities there so that independent vessels might land, because not only transportation is owned by these railroad companies, but the terminal facilities as well, and so they have made it impossible for an independent company to operate economically.

I am going to ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks the number of canals and locks that have been purchased by the United States, the cost of maintenance each year, and the traffic that passes through them, for the year ending June 30, 1913.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What I have said in reference to the Soo Canal practically applies to all of those mentioned above.

It has been frequently urged that the report of the House committee, to which I have referred, commonly known as the Alexander report, made a finding that from 95 to 97 per cent of the steamship lines of this country were in combination in one form or another, but the fact is no such finding was made in the report, for it will be ascertained by reference to page 403 of volume 4 of the report that the committee expressly stated that "the foregoing chapters discuss the control of regular line services in the most important divisions of this country's commerce," and I invite the attention of Senators particularly to the discussion which follows this statement in the report, because it is most illuminating and shows in detail how the domestic waterways of the country, which are maintained free of expense by the Government, are dominated and controlled largely by the great railway systems.

What have Senators to say with reference to this situation? Will they contend in the face of the fact that they vote large sums each year for the maintenance of our domestic waterways and exempt railroad-owned and trust-owned ships from the payment of any tolls, that this exemption is in the nature of a subsidy? They must be driven in the last analysis to this admission, or their contention with reference to exemption at Panama on the ground that it is a subsidy falls to the ground, and they must take the other horn of the dilemma, which has been practically abandoned, that there ought to be no exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls at Panama because such exemption would be a violation of treaty obligations.

There is no question, Mr. President, that a careful study of the methods adopted by the great transcontinental railways in this country will convince anyone that they not only opposed the construction of the Panama Canal for a quarter of a century and delayed its completion, but that they have been cultivating the sentiment which finds expression in appeals to national honor and in protest against the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. They are the interested parties who are now insisting upon a repeal of the act of 1912. Not only are the American transcontinental railways interested in this movement, but the Canadian Pacific as well, and they are acting together in insisting upon repeal.

I call to the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who mentioned Canada a while ago, and I am going to ask to have inserted in the RECORD a clipping from the Wall Street Journal of April 27, 1914, which has been publishing recently a series of articles on industrial conditions in Canada.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CANADA WELCOMES PANAMA CANAL AS A BENEFIT—BIG DITCH EXPECTED TO BE OF GREAT VALUE TO BRITISH COLUMBIA PROVINCE AND THE CANADIAN PACIFIC—CALCULATED TO LESSEN THE NUMBER OF EMPTY FREIGHT CARS HAULED OVER THE PRAIRIES, AFTER CARRYING GRAIN EAST—THE HAUL WEST IS OFFSET BY COAL AND LUMBER TRAFFIC BACK—CANADIAN PACIFIC AND POOLS.

MONTREAL, April 27, 1914.

ARTICLE 3.

Completion of the Panama Canal is looked forward to by the Canadian railroads and the Canadian people with great hopes. They feel grateful to the United States for building the canal, for it seems likely to do Canada more good than the United States. About the only advantage the United States will have over Canada will be in the naval feature. Commercially, it would have paid the Province of British Columbia to have issued bonds to pay for the canal, but instead of that it is not going to cost the Province one cent.

The Panama Canal is particularly welcomed by the Canadian Pacific, because it will lessen the number of empty freight cars hauled over the prairies. Canada's great crop is wheat, and that is all shipped eastward to market. The things that the prairie Provinces purchase of the east are high-priced and of small bulk, so that they fill but few of the returning cars. Miles of empty cars go thundering westward for more wheat.

But that is only half the story. The prairie Provinces are heavy purchasers of coal and lumber and other bulky forest products produced by British Columbia. The prairies have nothing to sell to British Columbia, and empty freight cars must go from the prairies into the mountains, to come back loaded with what the prairies want.

WORKING CARS BOTH WAYS.

When the Panama Canal is opened those empty cars will carry wheat for London. Enough wheat can be shipped profitably through the canal to pay for the British Columbian products needed on the prairies. The economy resulting from having loaded cars both ways will enable the Canadian Pacific to pick up wheat at least as far east as Calgary for shipment through the canal.

It is for this reason that the Canadian Pacific does not view with alarm completion of the Grank Trunk Pacific this year, and the completion next year of the Canadian Northern to the Pacific coast. Immigrants that will return on the wheat ships by way of Panama will furnish the labor so seriously needed in the Far West, and development will be so much more rapid that it is believed the country will grow up to the railroads as fast as they can handle it. Canada is so big, and the railroads are already competing at so many points, that investors in Canadian Pacific stock need not worry over the dividend.

The Panama Canal is a big question, and responsible men of the Dominion do not pretend that they have figured out the final effect of it. They do feel certain, however, that it is not going to hurt any of the Canadian railroads, and, in fact, is going to prevent them from hurting one another. This immigration will not affect the labor situation in Canada, which is about the same as in the United States.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY AND ATLANTIC POOL.

In view of the approaching opening of the canal, the Canadian Pacific is paying serious attention to ocean pools. The matter of joining the new North Atlantic conference is under consideration, but no decision has as yet been reached. The Canadian Pacific is really as great as a steamship proposition as a railroad, for its flag is on every sea. It owns more ships than the Southern Pacific, Union Pacific, Great Northern, and Northern Pacific combined. The Great Lakes are dominated by Canadian Pacific ships. They monopolize the trade of Puget Sound and Alaska. When you land at St. Johns or Sydney or Quebec or Montreal you step on a Canadian Pacific train. The company takes care of you on its trains, in its hotels, sells you newspapers, chewing gum, and picture postal cards while you are in Canada, and its ships take you away to the Orient, if you are going around the world. It takes a generation to develop such a system, and the mere building of so many miles of track does not mean that serious competition has been produced.

EFFECT OF EXEMPTION ON RAIL RATES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I come now to consider exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls as it affects, first, the transcontinental railway rates, and, second, the commerce between Pacific and Atlantic ports. For every reduction in the tolls charged at Panama on freight passing through the canal between American ports on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts there must be a corresponding reduction in the transcontinental rail rates as well as in rail rates from the interior to points where there is water competition; otherwise all freight accessible to water transportation would seek the water route; and for every addition to the rate of toll charged through the canal there is an opportunity given to the transcontinental lines to correspondingly raise the rail rates.

Mr. Prouty, formerly Interstate Commerce Commissioner, one of the most distinguished authorities on the rate question, in the Spokane rate case, reported in Twenty-first Interstate Commerce Reports, page 422, speaking of the effect of water competition upon rates by rail, said, amongst other things:

Carriers maintain the same transcontinental rate from Chicago as from New York, not by reason of the direct effect, but rather as an indirect result of water competition. The reason for this will be best understood by an actual illustration. Assume that a building requiring the use of a large amount of structural steel is to be erected in San Francisco. That steel is manufactured both at the seaboard and in Chicago. That which is made at the seaboard can be taken by water from the point of origin to the point of destination, and the rate at which it can move is therefore determined by water competition.

The cost of producing steel is the same at both points. In order, therefore, that the producers may stand an equal chance in competing for this business it is necessary that the rate from both points should be the same, and the business can not move from Chicago unless the rate from that point is as low as from the seaboard.

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway begins at Chicago. If this steel is bought at Chicago and moves by that line the entire freight money is retained by it. If, upon the other hand, the steel is bought at New York, moved by some line to Chicago, and there delivered to the Santa Fe, that line receives only a part of the through charge. The service performed by it is the same in either case, but the amount of its compensation is larger when the freight originates at Chicago. It is therefore for the interest of that line to name a rate from Chicago which will originate the business at that point instead of allowing it to originate upon the seaboard. The interest of the line from New York to Chicago is that the business should be taken up at New York, and as a compromise it is finally agreed to apply the same rate from both these points. This clearly shows how water competition, if it does not actually extend to the interior point, may and does dictate the rate from that point.

What would be true of the steel entering into the construction of this building is true also of almost every article of commerce which moves between the East and West. The Middle West to-day manufactures nearly everything which is produced upon the Atlantic seaboard, and the effect of this policy of the railroads has been to make the Middle West the almost exclusive market of origin for the intermountain country and largely for the Pacific coast itself.

This statement of the distinguished ex-commissioner is a complete answer to those who contend that the Middle West will not be benefited by the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. The reasons and the illustration given by Mr. Prouty are conclusive upon this subject, as well as upon the subject of the effect of water competition in reducing rail rates.

EFFECT OF REPEAL ON THE WEST.

Mr. President, the charging of tolls upon American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will impose a very great hardship upon the people of the whole country, in that it will enable the transcontinental railway lines, which now practically control the domestic waterways of the country, to charge to both producers and consumers a higher rate.

The products of the Northwest consist of heavy goods in bulk, which would naturally seek the water route to the East because the present rail rate is prohibitive. Many of the products of the West do not find an eastern market at all, but are left to rot and go to waste in the field.

Our products which would find a ready market in the East with lower rates are lumber, agricultural products of all kinds, salmon, fruit, hops, and wool, and when the resources of Alaska are developed coal ought to find a ready market in competition with eastern coals. In return for these products of the West we would receive large quantities of rice, cotton, structural steel, heavy cotton piece goods, agricultural and mining machinery, and goods of that class which are manufactured almost exclusively in the East.

A toll of $1.20 per ton on lumber, as disclosed by the hearings before the Interoceanic Canals Committee, would make it impossible for the American manufacturer of lumber to compete with the manufacturer in British Columbia, for two reasons: First, it is an undisputed fact that foreign vessels which might load with lumber at Vancouver can be operated at a very much less expense than the American ship loading at Portland, Oreg., with the same commodity, and the result would be our lumber could not compete in the eastern markets with that of British Columbia. Even the remission of tolls at Panama to the American vessel would not equalize the present handicap, but would materially assist in relieving the situation. Second, the foreign Governments, or at least those whose ships are likely to carry the lumber from British Columbia ports through the canal to the East, pay to their vessels by way of subsidy the amount of toll which would be paid by them for passing through the canal.

As tending to show what the effect of a toll charge of $1.20 per ton would be on lumber passing through the Panama Canal, I desire to call attention to the testimony of Mr. J. N. Teal, of Portland, Oreg., who appeared before the Interoceanic Canals Committee, in which he presents a letter from Mr. F. G. Donaldson, the manager of the traffic department of the West Coast Lumber Manufacturers' Association. This letter was addressed to Mr. Teal in response to a request from him for advice as to what the toll would be on 1,000 feet of lumber. He estimates that it would be about $1.66⅔ per thousand feet board measure. I ask to have the letter printed herein as a part of my remarks in order to show just what the effect of the proposed toll of $1.20 per ton would mean to the lumbermen of the West, and, so far as that is concerned, to the South as well, shipping lumber to the Orient or other transisthmian sections.

The letter is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., April 13, 1914.

Mr. J. N. TEAL, Spalding Building, City.

DEAR SIR: Answering your inquiry as to how I arrive at the conclusion that canal toll of $1.20 per registered ton would equal about 6 cents per hundredweight on lumber, wish to advise that this is based upon average weights and average loading capacities of the different kinds of lumber. A ship ton is equivalent to 100 cubic feet. Theoretically 100 cubic feet of space should load 100 cubic feet of lumber. This would be 1,200 feet board measure. However, my experience has convinced me that only about 60 per cent of actual space is available for lumber loading because of unevenness of lengths and thicknesses of the different kinds of lumber. On this basis, instead of 1,200 feet board measure being loaded in 100 cubic feet of ship space, the actual average load would in all probability not exceed 720 feet board measure, and this is the footage used in my computation. On this basis a charge of $1.20 per 100 cubic feet of space should figure $1.66⅔ per thousand feet board measure of all kinds of lumber. To reduce this cost per thousand feet to cents per hundredweight on each kind of lumber, you have to ascertain the average weight of the different kinds of lumber that are likely to be shipped. The estimated weights are as follows:

	Pounds per M feet.
Rough green fir	3,300
Rough dry fir	3,000
Common dimension	2,600
Flooring, rustic, and shiplap	2,000
Ceiling and wainscoting	1,400

Using these weights, 5,000 feet of lumber, consisting of 1,000 feet of each of the different classes of lumber referred to, would make the total weight 12,300 pounds, or an average for each 1,000 feet, 2,460 pounds. Taking a cost of $1.66⅔ per thousand feet board measure, as figured above, and applying it to average lumber, 2,460 pounds per thousand feet, gives you an average cost per hundredweight of actual weight, 6.8 cents.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It will be seen from this that because of the character of a lumber cargo it is not possible to carry much in excess of 720 feet board measure in 100 cubic feet of ship space. This, of course, would compel lumber shipments to pay toll largely in excess of the actual cargo.

The rates from the Pacific coast by rail east to the Mississippi River are very much higher than they are from Philadelphia or New York to the same point. That is due to the density of traffic in the East as well as to the more active competition between the roads. It is disclosed in the statement of Mr. Teal before the committee that if we take a 40-cent water rate on lumber from Pacific coast points to Philadelphia or New York it might be carried as far west by rail as Chicago or St. Louis, or nearly that far, depending somewhat upon circumstances. At least it could be carried west until the rate from the Pacific coast by rail met the eastern rate. He gives an instance of salmon shipped by water to New York from the Pacific coast, then through the Great Lakes to Duluth, thence back as far as the 11-cent car rate would take it until it met Pacific coast rates by rail, and shows that starch and other products from Iowa to New York by rail and thence to Portland by water could be carried cheaper than taking them from the point of initial shipment to the Pacific coast direct by rail.

Take another illustration: Wool is now carried from Australia to San Francisco for 75 cents per hundred, from San Francisco by rail to Boston at 80 cents per hundred, making the through rate from Australia to Boston $1.55 per hundred. It is estimated that when the canal is completed the through rate to Boston will be about $1 per hundred. It may be answered that domestic wool from Montana, Utah, Idaho, and other Western States might be shipped through the canal at the lower rate in competition with Australian wool. This can not be done, for the reason that the railroads maintain such a high rate from intermountain points to the coast that the water route will not be accessible to wool or other intermountain products. Australian wool from San Francisco to Boston, as I have shown, is carried at 80 cents per hundred. From Nevada points, 500 miles nearer Boston, the railroads charge $2 per hundred on domestic wool. From Arizona points, 600 miles nearer Boston, they charge $1.90 per hundred. From Boise, Idaho, 600 miles nearer Boston, they charge $2.05½ per hundred. The freight charge by rail from these intermountain points to the Pacific coast is maintained at such a high rate as to drive the freight eastward by rail.

It will thus be seen that the freight rate on wool from the western country can not possibly compete with imported wools, and it is questionable if this can be done even if coastwise vessels are exempted from the payment of tolls.

It will be remembered that in his first note of protest Chargé d'Affaires Innis stated that the proposal to exempt all American shipping from the payment of tolls would, in the opinion of the British Government, involve an infraction of the treaty; and, further, that there was no difference in principle between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether. In other words, while admitting the application to Panama of the basis of neutralization in force at Suez, permitting other nations the right to refund tolls collected there, it was proposed to deny the United States the right to make the same refund at Panama either in the way of exemption of tolls or by a direct subsidy. It is but fair to say that this protest was practically abandoned, but it shows the injustice of Great Britain in her first note of protest. It is a well-known fact that other nations have made appropriations to cover the tolls paid at Suez by their merchant ships, and steps are being taken by Russia, Spain, Japan, and other powers to grant to their vessels subsidies equivalent to the tolls that are to be charged at Panama.

In this connection I call the attention of the Senate to the report of Mr. George W. Guthrie, American minister to Japan, made to this Government on the 13th ultimo, as showing the policy of the Japanese Government with reference to the Panama Canal. He points out the plan of the Government to which he is accredited of subsidizing a trans-Panama steamship line, which contemplates eight steamers of 9,000 tons or more each. The proposed ports of call are given by him as follows:

Eastern line: Outward voyage—Yokohama, Seattle, Panama, Colon, and New York; inward voyage—New York, New Orleans, Colon, Panama, Seattle, and Yokohama. Western line: Outward voyage—Yokohama, Kobe, Moji, Shanghai, Manila, and Hongkong; inward voyage—Hongkong, Manila, Shanghai, Moji, Kobe, and Yokohama.

The annual amounts of subsidy proposed in aid of the trans-Panama service during a period of five years commencing with 1915, Mr. Guthrie points out are as follows: 1915–16, $718.307; 1916–17, $841,116; 1917–18, $875,447; 1918–19, $875,447; 1919–20, $875,447. Those allotted to the San Francisco line during the same period are as follows: 1915–16, $1,180,924; 1916–17, $1,137,113; 1917–18, $1,071,495; 1918–19, $1,005,877; 1919–20, $940,259.

What Japan proposes to do is in line with the policy which is being adopted by other Governments, so that American vessels engaged in the over-sea trade, as well as those engaged in the coastwise trade, if the present policy of repeal prevails, will be placed upon the same footing so far as tolls are concerned, and in the very nature of things it will be a physical impossibility to restore in whole or in part the American merchant marine to the proud place it once occupied in the ports of the world.

I ask permission, Mr. President, to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement made by Mr. Teal in his testimony before the Interoceanic Canals Committee on the fisheries products of the Northwest and certain comparative statements of rates on different classes of commodities in less-than-carload lots by water and by rail. These statements will show in part the commodities which will be shipped by water from the West and a comparison of the rates charged by water and by rail.

The matter referred to is as follows:

North Pacific salmon pack, 1913.

	Cases.	Value.
Alaska	3,746,493	$13,859,478
Puget Sound	2,583,463	13,329,168
Columbia River	266,479	2,012,387
Sacramento River	950	7,600
Outside, or coast streams	112,161	552,045
British Columbia	1,353,901	8,803,213

Totals, 8,063,447 cases, about 389,170,000 pounds, or 193,585 tons. Total value, $38,563,891.

North Pacific halibut catch.

	Pounds.

The selling price of halibut by fishers at place of landing varies from 2 cents to 9½ cents, the average being about 5 cents a pound, making the 1913 catch worth at landing point about $2,771,000.

Halibut catch for 1913 divided as to nationality of vessels in north Pacific.

	Pounds.
American vessels	42,636,505
Canadian vessels	12,785,300

The immense quantities of halibut to be had in north Pacific waters were until recently available for only a limited population near the Pacific coast shore line. The large companies controlling this trade are now operating solid refrigerator halibut trains across the continent to Chicago, and even to the Atlantic seaboard, delivering the major portion of the entire catch to that territory. As exploration for the halibut banks is proceeding farther out to sea and also out to the north, there is no reason why the annual catch of this fish should not increase for several years.

If this enormous supply of food fish could be handled through the Panama Canal in refrigerator service at a lower figure than is now possible, or if the effect of competition made the rate across the continent less than at present the benefit would be reaped by the consumers of the East. At the present time the wholesale price for halibut delivered to eastern centers runs 15 cents a pound or better, and the retail ranges as high as 25 cents. It would seem that canal traffic unimpeded by tolls should accomplish a reduction there.

There is a growing trade in fresh salmon, frozen salmon, mild-cured salmon, and pickled salmon. As the catch of salmon in extreme northern waters may be increased rapidly, the possibility of placing on the Atlantic seaboard a large amount of this valuable food fish at a low figure is certainly greater with no tolls through the canal than with them. Siberia last year produced only about 130,000 cases of salmon, and it is conceded that all the streams of that region, as well as those of extreme northern Alaska, have wonderful possibilities in the production of this food fish. There is no greater fish preserve to be found in all the world than in these north Pacific waters. When they are properly explored and developed and proper consideration is given to the hatching of young fry, it would seem like the whole country would of necessity have a profound interest in being kept close to the fishing grounds with the lowest possible rate that may be had through the Panama Canal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the other day discussed the refunding of tolls by other countries. I do not recall whether he mentioned Japan or not, but he did mention other powers that were making arrangements now to refund the tolls that might be paid by their vessels to the canal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did call attention to Japan, as that is an imminent matter. The Diet has not passed finally upon it, but it is expressed by the Japanese officials as certain to come.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad the Senator did. I will not discuss it, then, but simply ask to have inserted in the RECORD the showing that is made with reference to Japan where she is making provision for her ships as far ahead as 1920 in order to meet the tolls they will have to pay to pass through the canal. How in the world can our vessels compete with Japanese vessels, how can we compete with Great Britain, which subsidizes her vessels and will refund to them the amount of tolls?

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my address a comparative statement of the rates to Portland on various commodities in carload lots and less than carload lots by water and by rail, showing the difference in favor of water competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS FISH PRODUCTS, ALASKA, 1913.

Codfish, 11,916,900 pounds. Value, about $500,000 at point of delivery.

Pickled salmon, 7,666,400 pounds. Value, about $600,000.

Herring, 10,413,926 pounds. Value, about $500,000 at point of delivery.

Mild-cured salmon (all North Pacific waters), about 30,000 tierces. Each tierce net about 800 pounds, or 24,000,000 pounds. Total value, approximately $2,400,000.

Other miscellaneous fish products in Alaska, 1913, would aggregate more than 500,000 tons. These miscellaneous products consist of fish oil, whale oil, herring fertilizer, whale fertilizer, dry salt fish, etc.

This year the Grand Trunk Pacific is completing its connection to Prince Rupert, the Pacific coast terminal for the road. The first influence upon the United States transportation situation is felt already. Traffic officials of the new Canadian transcontinental line are offering to absorb the local boat haul from any of the adjacent Alaska territory which would mean all of the southeastern district, and give to the salmon product the same transcontinental freight rate that is given by the United States lines. Some of the salmon men believe that unless a materially lower rate is made as a result of the construction of the canal the new Canadian line will be able to dominate that part of the southeastern pack which may move to Europe or any part of the United States beyond the Mississippi River. The southeastern pack runs about 2,000,000 cases a year.

FRUIT GROWERS' TRANSPORTATION LEAGUE,
Portland, Oreg., ———.

The understanding is that tolls will base upon ship's registered tonnage at $1.20 per ton of 100 cubic feet.

Have been advised that relation of registered tonnage to dead-weight tonnage, or cubic tonnage, capacity of vessels will range materially, but that in the average cases the tolls will apply upon approximately 60 per cent of the tonnage carried, where the ship is loaded to its capacity.

Where ship is not loaded to its full carrying capacity, the tolls applying against it will increase correspondingly, and to that extent become a higher charge against the freight itself.

To illustrate in the case of apples:

If the registered and cargo tonnage equalizes, $1.20 per 100 cubic feet will mean 48 cents per 40 cubic feet ton, or 2 cents per box per apples. Or, if tonnage of 2,000 pounds at 48 cents per ton, this would mean approximately 1 cent per box.

Apples and other fruits, refrigerated, are handled upon cubic basis. The apple box itself (packed) measures 1.66 feet, or 24.1 boxes per 40 feet cubic measurement. But the sticking and stripping, to enable proper refrigeration and ventilation in cold chambers, adds to displacement of box, and increases it to 2 cubic feet, or 20 boxes per ton, or at 48 cents per cubic 40-foot ton, 2.4 cents per box apples.

The application on this and other Northwest traffic, of canal tolls, will therefore necessitate that the vessels be loaded to fullest capacity in order to get minimum canal-toll application per unit of freight carried. It is manifest that with the tonnage susceptible of immediate development the application of tolls, under this condition, will make service irregular or infrequent.

Only frequent and regular service on fresh fruits will be of any benefit to the industry and enable shipment through canal. The lowest possible rate available by vessel is the only inducement that will attract tonnage to the water movement, and make possible any reduction in freight rates from the present maximum basis which the fruit can not stand.

Apple production (estimated) Northwest States, Oregon, Washington, and Idaho:

1914. Now estimated at 25,000 cars. All fruits at 35,000 cars.

1916. Estimated as 35,000 to 40,000 cars. All fruits, upward of 50,000 cars.

1918. Estimated as 50,000 cars. All fruits, upward of 65,000 cars.

At best, a very nominal tonnage of Northwest fruits can get into Atlantic seaboard markets at the present rail rates. The apple movement must amount to 25 per cent of total annual tonnage in those markets in order to safely balance general distribution. Nothing but the lowest possible rate will enable distribution in large quantity in Atlantic seaboard territory, and only the cheapest water rate will enable that.

Any rate exceeding $8 to $9.60 per cubic 40-foot ton will prevent water movement at this stage of production. It is evident that a lower rate must be anticipated for future years' movement.

The Northwest fruit industry in detail will not survive except at minimum costs of transportation, possible only by water movement. To-day the soft-fruit (outside of apples) industry is in a critical condition. We can not ship those products from Northwest sections annually at the present freight costs profitably. The peach industry has been destroyed by removal of trees to the extent of 40 per cent in different sections because of repeated losses accordingly.

Present freight rate on apples per box Northwest to New York City approximates 50 cents. Box of apples packed and loaded costs 65 to 90 cents; box of apples contains less than 50 pounds. The fruit must be laid down in Atlantic markets at not to exceed 75 cents, including transportation and production costs, to enable distribution, and that will not include any profits.

A greatly reduced rate on other fruits by water will make the industry reasonably profitable, and allow the peach industry to survive, instead of being destroyed.

The canal tolls will severely affect both the producer and the consumer.

Northwest produces 30,000,000 to 35,000,000 pounds of dried fruits annually. This must have an exceedingly low rate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, take it in my State. When it is remembered, Mr. President, that the Columbia River alone drains an area of more than 250,000 square miles of the most fertile land in the world, comprising a part of British Columbia, Montana, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Wyoming, and that tributary to the ports of Portland and Astoria there are produced, according to the latest Government reports, about 102,000,000 bushels of wheat, 68,000,000 bushels of oats, 20,000,000 bushels of barley, and 800,000 bushels of rye, and that the stumpage value of timber in Oregon and Washington is $950,000,000, and that the stumpage value of the standing timber in Idaho and Montana is valued at $200,000,000, it can be realized how much the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls amounts to to the people of the Northwest, and not only to them but to the consumers who will profit by a reduced rate for these commodities. Nor does it apply alone to these particular commodities, but to the products of the Northwest which are susceptible to shipment in bulk by the Panama Canal.

It will enable us to ship from our part of the country to the East products which now rot in our forests and rot in our fields and on the farm. It not only benefits the lumberman, but it benefits the farmer and benefits every man who produces anything in our section of the country. I have not gone into California, where they have thousands of tons of fruit and other products that could find ready access to the markets of the East if this policy of toll exemption prevails in this country, much of which can not come East if the act is repealed.

In order to show the immense tonnage in and out of Portland, I ask to have printed a statement of the foreign and domestic tonnage for the year 1913.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Foreign ocean tonnage in and out of Portland, year 1913.

	Tons.
Exports	492,448	Value	$14,743,117
Imports	38,473	Value	3,339,117
Total	530,921	Total	18,082,234

Domestic ocean tonnage in and out of Portland, year 1913.

	Tons.
Forwarded	741,317	Value	$18,109,976
Received	1,128,493	Value	23,686,212
Total	1,869,810	Total	41,796,188

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This refers to one port alone, and the tonnage of San Francisco is larger and that of Seattle practically as large as that of Portland. All of this immense tonnage will be affected by the policy of this Government with respect to the use of the Panama Canal by vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic.

Although I have endeavored to condense what I have had to say on a subject of immense importance to the people of this country, I feel that I have trespassed too long already upon the patience of the Senate, and in conclusion I appeal to my colleagues on both sides of the Chamber to insist upon retaining upon the statute books the Panama Canal act of 1912 in its entirety. If the exemption clause is repealed it is but an entering wedge, for the same insidious influences that have been cultivating a sentiment for repeal will soon be as industriously at work cultivating an even stronger sentiment in favor of opening the canal to railroad-owned ships. That is the second and most important step to the transcontinental railways.

I appeal to you to insist upon the retention of the act in question upon our statute books as the American construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—a construction which in no way violates that treaty and in no way sullies the national honor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I will state that I received a letter this morning saying to me that I ought to abandon my contention that our coastwise steamers should pass through the Panama Canal free of tolls for the reason that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in his very able address yesterday had proved to the satisfaction of my correspondent that the Panama Canal was not in the ordinary sense a waterway through which our coastwise ships should pass. I have turned to the speech of the Senator from New York, and I find this, which I think is rather a remarkable utterance:

> But, Mr. President, the real gist of this discrimination is not the discrimination between coastwise trade, properly so called, and other trade. No real coastwise trade will go through that canal. It is a thousand miles and more away from our coast. The trade that goes through it will be real over-seas trade, carried on by great ships, making long voyages—in its nature the exact antithesis to real coastwise trade.

It occurred to me after reading that that we recognize California, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Guam as ports to which we can send our coastwise ships around the Horn, which is an infinitely longer voyage than it will be through the canal. So it seems to me that argument has not either force or pertinence.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am in thorough accord with the Senator from New Hampshire. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do. I yield the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. In connection with the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, is it not true that traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States has always been considered by our laws as coastwise trade?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course.

Mr. BRISTOW. When that traffic was carried on around Cape Horn or through the Straits of Magellan it was 8,000 miles farther than it will be when it comes through the canal. That never had been questioned until the Senator from New York discovered this new theory. I believe that because the canal is in competition with the transcontinental railroads an effort is being made to regard this as no longer coastwise.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator, as he investigated the Panama Canal situation at one time on the ground, is it not a fact that the transcontinental railways at one time controlled the coastwise shipping on the Pacific coast, paying immense sums per annum to prevent water competition?

Mr. BRISTOW. They paid from $75,000 to $90,000 per month, aggregating approximately, for a part of the time, $1,000,000 a year. It was a payment made for the purpose of controlling the rates by way of Panama between Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States. They cared nothing about the rates between the Central American ports and New York; they paid no attention to that. The Panama Railroad Co. and the Pacific Mail handled all the traffic between the Pacific ports of Central America and Mexico and New York at any rate they saw fit to charge, but when it came to making a rate between San Francisco and New York, then it was a different proposition. To control that rate this transcontinental railroad pool paid for a part of the time $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, one would be discouraged to attempt to make what might be called a purely legal argument with reference to the history and the terms used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and as to whether or not the terms there preclude the United States from sending through her canal her vessels free of charge. The subject has been so completely covered that there is no virgin soil in that discussion. Not only has the field been thoroughly occupied, but it has been occupied with such ability and covered by such resource of argument that it would be an act of supererogation to undertake to add to it.

The argument presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] covered the field most thoroughly, not alone with reference to legal propositions but as to other propositions. The able legal presentation of our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has not been answered and will not be answered, and no one will undertake to answer it from a legal standpoint. The argument of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], at a former term have covered the subject matter so that one is utterly discouraged to enter upon that field, feeling that he must necessarily quit it without adding anything to the strength of the argument; certainly without adding anything in the way of a new legal principle.

But in the long debate and the many suggestions which have been made by those who are in favor of repeal some things have been presented that I am not quite willing, so far as I am individually concerned, shall go unchallenged. They seem to me to merit attention, and to them I am going to give some consideration. I venture to open my remarks by a quotation from one of the most remarkable speeches ever made in Congress, one of the most effective speeches, so far as results in the way of securing votes are concerned, and upon a kindred subject to that which we are now discussing. Mr. Ames said:

> To expatiate on the value of public faith may pass with some men for declamation. To such men I have nothing to say; to others I will urge, Can any circumstance mark upon a people more turpitude and debasement? Can anything tend more to make men think themselves mean or degrade to a lower point their estimation of virtue and their standard of action? It would not merely demoralize men; it tends to break all the ligaments of society, to dissolve the mysterious charm which attracts individuals to the nation, and to inspire in its stead a repulsive sense of shame and disgust.

Mr. Ames was speaking of a nation's obligations to its treaties. When he arose in the House of Representatives to make his argument in behalf of what was known as the British treaty, he was greeted with manifestations of disapproval. The country was thoroughly aroused in opposition to the treaty. It is said by the historian that nevertheless it was this argument in behalf of that treaty which resulted in the appropriation which was then under consideration for the purpose of carrying it into effect. This address of Mr. Ames does not state too strongly the view of those who are opposed to this repeal as to the question of national honor and national faith. Those who are opposed to this measure go the full length of the most earnest and eloquent in behalf of maintaining the national honor and of preserving a sensitive regard for every reasonable construction of a treaty into which we have entered. National honor requires us to do all our treaty demands we should do, and national honor requires that we do nothing which our treaty does not require us to do. Our conception of national honor does not require a surrender of any right out of a false sentiment or a restless desire to be loosely profligate of our people's interests.

What is the situation here? Two great and powerful nations, friendly, each holding a great respect for the other, have entered into a treaty. England, with her usual power and astuteness, is contending that under that treaty we should exclude from the canal our ships, this decession relating now particularly to our ships engaged in the coastwise trade. That would be a peculiar advantage to the English nation. No one would reap more benefit from that than would the English nation itself.

The advantage to the United States of sending through her canal her coastwise shipping would not be so great as the advantage to the English nation would be to have them excluded. Therefore we must assume that England is not wholly free from that selfish purpose which characterizes nations as well as individuals, and always will until the millennium has set in. She is contending for what she thinks her rights under the treaty. Shall any greater stigma of national dishonor attach to the representatives of the great Republic of the West for contending in a respectful, earnest, and firm way for the rights which it is believed are guaranteed to the American people under the terms of that treaty? Is it a mark of national dishonor for the representatives of a people to guard with jealousy the rights of the Nation and the people?

When did it become an evidence or a manifestation of national dishonor for a people to insist upon a fair construction of a treaty, which treaty involved interests not only of prime concern to the present, but of supreme and immeasurable concern to the distant future of the Nation? I venture to say, Mr. President, that a vast amount of apparent sentiment in regard to national honor is to some extent a false sentiment. It is by reason of that highly attenuated but overcapitalized cosmopolitanism, which seems to apologize for everything that is American and feels more or less the stigma of the crime when charged with that fact before the nations of the earth.

Let it be understood in the beginning, therefore, that those who stand against repeal stand in the position of insisting upon what we deem our rights under the treaty, clearly to our mind evidenced by the terms of the treaty; that we would no more accept a position which would impeach the honor of the United States than would the distinguished gentlemen who are advocating the other side of the proposition.

There has been a remarkable propaganda going on in this country for the last three or four or five months with reference to this question of national honor and national integrity. I do not refer to Senators who occupy seats in this Chamber; but I do say, Mr. President, that never heretofore have the American people supposed that our national honor reposed alone in that peculiar class of people who have been propagating this doctrine throughout the country for the last six months. It is our first knowledge of the fact that they were so extremely sensitive upon this subject.

The sense of national honor, Mr. President, is just as keenly felt and will be as sedulously guarded by the great mass of the American people, one and all, in the future as it has been in the past, and I should like to see eliminated from this debate this peculiar coloring and stripe of Phariseeism which gathers to itself the sole and self-constituted custodianship of the national honor of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, what is the real controlling and the important issue which is presented in this debate? What is the proposition which we shall finally and I am afraid definitely settle, at least settle to such an extent that we shall be much embarrassed in the future if we undertake to counteract or retrace our action here? What is the proposition upon which if we take a stand it will be difficult to recede in the future?

If this were alone a domestic question, we might grant free tolls to-day and take them away to-morrow; we might refuse free tolls to-day and grant them to-morrow; it might be deemed wise at one time or unwise at another time; but it would be solely within the keeping of the American people and of the American Congress; we would not be embarrassed when we came to change our position in regard to the matter; but if we place the construction upon the treaty which we are now asked to place upon it, we could never retrieve our position without a distinct charge of national dishonor and without exceptionable, if not insuperable, embarrassment with other nations of the earth.

The treaty once construed, in view of the President's message, in view of the argument of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in view of the arguments which have been made by such Senators as the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]—that action once had and this treaty once so construed, the situation will be far more difficult to relieve ourselves of than we can at this time anticipate. It will be interpreted by the Senate; it will be interepreted by the country; it will be interpreted by the nations of the earth as a construction which is final and conclusive, and will be a limitation upon our power over that canal which will always be raised against us should we undertake to vary our policy in the future. This vote, sir, construes the treaty; all other matters are incidental and we must not permit ourselves to be misled as to the consequences or effect of that construction.

So, Mr. President, the real question which we are settling here is one of construction of the treaty; the real problem which we are to determine and which will have a vital and lasting effect is, What are our rights under its provisions? No more important question than that, Mr. President, has been presented to this Congress for many a year. I think I am only repeating a commonplace when I say that it is the most important question which has engaged the attention of Congress for a quarter of a century. It has been debated, therefore, with the responsibility which men feel when presenting that kind of a question; and I do not want to vary, Mr. President, if I can help it, from the high plane of argument so far as that earnestness and dignity which have characterized the debate throughout are concerned. But I must say in candor that I do not belong in this particular controversy with those who claim a peculiar qualification by reason of a judicial temperament. I think, when the rights of the United States are seriously involved and they are vital and controlling, that after one has made a thorough investigation and has studied the matter to the best of his ability and come to the conclusion that vital interests are involved, he must necessarily feel the gravity of a vote which would possibly take from the American people a matter of supreme concern to them. I shall not therefore in this debate size up the two sides evenly, balancing them as nearly as I can, and then get into the middle and with serene beneficent ubiquity announce a conclusion which is diaphanous with indifference.

I have an earnest and abiding conviction that not only have we a right to pass our ships through the Panama Canal without the payment of tolls, but that if we waive that right such consequences are to follow in the end and such detriment to the American people as years go on, that the powerful and dominant nation which has taken possession of the Suez Canal after it was constructed by France will undoubtedly control the vast commerce which ought to belong to this great and growing Republic. In that proposition is wrapped up not the shipping interest, not the interest of transportation on the railroads of the country, but in it is wrapped up the interest of our entire people, for involved in it is all that goes to make up a strong and puissant nation. Commerce is one of the indispensable elements of our growth and development. If it were merely an economic question, it would be easy for us to modify our views at one time or another as circumstances and conditions might dictate.

Now, what is the proposition? It is whether or not we are going to limit our jurisdiction and our sovereignty and impeach and impair our title to the Panama Canal and the territory over which it is built. That is the proposition which will be settled by this vote; and no Senator need suppose that it will ever be construed in any other light. If we should reject this proposition, we could next year with perfect safety, having put the construction upon the treaty, deal with the question of subsidy, but now the prime question which we are proceeding to determine is the other question, and that overshadows and dominates and controls all other propositions.

I must say, with all due respect, that it seems to me that some of our friends who are advocating repeal have been driven to dire extremities for argument. For the first time within the last few weeks we have heard the doctrine that we have a conditional and imperfect title to the Panama Canal and to the grant of territory over which that canal runs. The ingenuity of Sir Edward Grey did not suggest any such proposition; the wide-roving genius which controls the English press had not discovered any such proposition; with all the genius for diplomacy and with all the legal acumen which the English nation possesses, it did not originate on the other side of the ocean. On the other hand, sir, Sir Edward Grey distinctly stated in his note that our sovereignty over the canal was established, and he admitted it in his letter without any controversy; but it has been brought in here, Mr. President, within the last few days to meet a difficult phase of the argument which was made by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

So it is firmly and, if I may say so, with some intellectual audacity declared that our title to the Panama Canal is a conditional title, and that should we disregard the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we would imperil and impeach our title to the canal. That must necessarily present a very interesting question; we will not impeach our title if we know it, and it has a tendency to excite some fear in the minds of those who have not access daily to the documents upon which our title is founded. That I may not be charged with being in error, I call attention to some of the statements in regard to this position.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] stated a few days ago that it was a remarkable thing to hear a former member of the Federal bench advocate the possible abrogation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, when it could not be done without imperiling our title to the canal. In a colloquy between the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself a few days ago this question arose, and he said:

> We took the very strip of land in Panama by treaty as a conditional grant from Panama, and we can not morally and in good faith use it, and we have no title to it, except subject to the conditions of the grant, and the Panama treaty with us made the Hay-Pauncefote treaty a part of itself.

The clear logic of that position is that a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would imperil and impeach and break the title of the United States to the Panama Canal and the territory through which it runs. Again, he said:

> But the fallacy is that you insist on treating the Panama Canal as a purely domestic concern, when your very title is international and not national.

As to just what kind of a title an "international title" is, or what it takes to constitute an international title, I am yet seeking for light; but it evidently means, if it means anything, that our title to the Panama Canal rests not in the United States alone, but that we have a partnership; that there is a partnership title, and that a violation of that partnership or a disregard of its terms will result in the impeachment of the title—

> And when the very grant by which you hold this strip is a grant with conditions, and an international grant and international conditions at that.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] yesterday built his entire argument upon the proposition that we had no other than a conditional title to the Panama Canal. He stated that that was the basis upon which he rested his remarkable presentation as to the necessity of repeal. I therefore take the liberty of quoting his language as I find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask Senators to pay particular attention to it. He said:

> That treaty with Panama is the basis of our rights. That treaty lies at the foundation of any question that can be raised as to what we do with the canal which we are constructing, because it is by that treaty, and by that treaty alone, that we get our title. By that treaty the grant of property and jurisdiction upon which we have proceeded, upon which we hold the canal, is subject to the provision that the canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of November 18, 1901.
> So the treaty with Great Britain which is referred to here is carried into our title as a limitation upon it.

Mr. President, that language coming from one of the leaders of the American bar, a man of international reputation, will be construed in but one way, and could be construed in but one way, and that is that a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as he interprets it would impeach and impair the title upon which we have expended our money, and that the only way by which we can maintain a title is to observe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty according to his interpretation.

Let us see what there is to this conditional title. New as it is, unexpected as it is in this debate, born of the dire necessities of the case, it may be that there is something in it. Let us turn with some degree of care and, at the cost perhaps of tediousness, read a few provisions from that treaty:

ARTICLE 2.

> The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed.

Furthermore:

> The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.
> The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

Not only the lawyer, but the layman, will at once observe that there are no conditions of that grant other than that it be used as a canal; that it is a grant in perpetuity; that there are no conditions precedent and no conditions subsequent; that it is a complete grant within itself; and the fair construction of the language, yea, more, the only construction that can be placed upon the language, is that so long as that property is used for a canal the title to it remains in perpetuity in the United States. Furthermore:

ARTICLE 3.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

Senators, those are the terms of the grant. If they were in a deed, you would have no trouble in construing it. You would know that so long as you maintained the property there as a canal and for which it was granted, no one could question it. Let me go further, however; and this is the portion of the treaty to which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] did not feel under the necessity of calling to the attention of the Senate.

The provision of the treaty which settles the terms of the grant and fixes it, whether as an absolute or as a conditional grant, may be found in article 14. The fact that it seems to have been of no concern to the Senator can be based upon no other proposition than that he must have overlooked it.

Now, observe:

As the price or compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of $10,000,000 in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of $250,000 in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

There is the consideration for the grant; and when we paid that $10,000,000 upon the exchange of that treaty the title to the Panama Canal, under the terms of the treaty, became as absolute and perfect in the United States, so long as we used it for a canal, as the title to the Territory of Alaska or the title to the District of Columbia, upon which this Capitol stands.

The rights, powers, privileges, and advantages covered by this treaty are paid for, in the language of the treaty, by $10,000,000 and $250,000 annually thereafter. Even if we should fail to pay the $250,000, however, what would be the effect as a legal proposition? Would it impair the title? Certainly not. Panama would have a claim of debt against us for $250,000; but Panama could not raise the question of conditional title by reason of our failing to pay the debt, any more than if I should obtain a deed from you, and give you my promissory note, and I should fail to pay the note, you could go into a court of equity and cancel the deed. Such propositions are so well established that I hesitate to dwell longer upon them before this body.

That is not all, however. The "felicitous appropriateness" of the language hereafter used by Mr. Hay will be apparent. In order that no inference to the contrary should be drawn, what does Mr. Hay say? This is in the consideration paragraph, where they are fixing the question of the title and the consideration:

But no delay or difference of opinion under this article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

Not only is it plain that we paid this consideration for the title and took our grant in perpetuity, which under rules of construction would be conclusive as to its permanence and abiding effect, but they placed in the consideration paragraph a distinct provision that no other provision of the treaty should in any way affect the operation of the convention. Could it be plainer, more positive, and conclusive? And why was it put there?

Sir, I presume it might be argued it was put there to prevent even a reference as to the conditional effect of the title. That is article 14. Over on the next page, after we have passed the terms of the grant and the consideration paid, and passed by the proposition that no other provision in the treaty should affect its operation, we find article 18, upon which the Senator from New York laid stress yesterday. What does it say?

The canal when constructed, and the entrances thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

There is a contract by which, under all laws of morals and treaty obligations, we are bound; but if we had taken a distinct grant of the canal property in a separate instrument, and placed this other in a different and distinct agreement—the agreement with reference to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—we would be precisely in the same position as a legal proposition that we are now. There is no condition in article 18 as to forfeiture. There is no intimation that there is to be any impairment of title. We are under precisely the same obligation to observe it as if it were a distinct and separate agreement or treaty, but it has no bearing or effect upon it nor does it in any wise condition our title.

I do not argue here that we can violate article 18, because it is a treaty obligation, and we are bound by it the same as any other treaty obligation; but if we did see fit to violate it, that would not affect our title. It would only be an impeachment of our good faith with reference to the observance of treaties, the same as it would be if we should violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

One thing more, Mr. President. How does this particular proposition get into this debate? It is pretty well understood among lawyers that no one can impeach a title or raise a question as to its being a conditional title and insist upon a forfeiture except the man who executes the deed or his successors in interest. Is Panama raising any question about this matter? Is Panama concerned about it? With all due respect to our friends who are insisting upon repeal, why should every far-reaching, far-removed technicality that can be possibly conjured up by an ingenious and fertile brain be brought into this debate for the purpose of using it against the interests of the United States?

It is enough for statesmen and patriots, it would seem, to concede that which the plain terms of the treaty demand. It is no part of the duty of an American citizen to go abroad in search for technicalities which the nationals of England have not seen fit to use, for the purpose of using them against the interests of our people. It is not in the code of national honor to resolve every chimerical doubt against us.

National honor does not go that far. Some sanguine and sentimental people may promote such doctrine, but it is contrary to the first principles of American citizenship, and no man can justify it for a moment. And let me say to the Senate in passing that such arguments will be answered in the end by the tribunal from which there is no appeal. The people will yield what our treaty demands, but they will hold to strict accountability that false patriotism which yields up valuable rights when the treaty calls for no such sacrifice.

What did John Hay say about this matter? When he communicated this treaty to the Senate he used language not inappropriate when we are considering the claim that we have but doubtful title:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal.

I do not know that the fact that Mr. Hay wrote the Pike County Ballads would particularly entitle him to qualify as a man who could write a treaty; but certainly he understood perfectly the effect of the word "entirely" when he said that it was to be an entirely American canal; not an international canal, not an international title, not a conditional title, not a partnership, but entirely an American canal. He goes further, however, and says:

The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

Mr. President, when this matter was first considered, when we were building the canal, this question went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court seems to have had a different view as to this title. You will remember that some enterprising citizen came to the conclusion that our title was imperfect; that we ought not to expend millions of dollars upon the canal with an imperfect or conditional title. So he brought an action to restrain Secretary Shaw and others from issuing bonds and expending money for the purpose of building the canal. The Supreme Court took cognizance of the case, and discussed it, and passed upon the subject to some extent. They say:

The "proposition is that the Canal Zone is no part of the territory of the United States, and that therefore the Government is powerless to do anything * * * therein. Article 2 of the treaty heretofore referred to 'grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal.' By article 3 Panama 'grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.'"

Other provisions of the treaty add to the grants named in these two articles further guaranties of exclusive rights of the United States in the construction and maintenance of this canal. It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect and that the territory described does not belong to this Nation because of the omission of some technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator give us the reference?

Mr. BORAH. I have read from the case of Wilson v. Shaw (204 U. S., p. 24). It is hypercritical, says the Supreme Court of the United States—that is, far removed; not sound in reason; based upon fallacy; searching for a technicality; a resort to the last chance—even to suggest that the title of the United States is imperfect in any respect.

No, Mr. President. The title of the United States to the Panama Canal is just as perfect, I repeat, as its title to the territory upon which are sitting to-day. Sir, if all other arguments have been demolished, if every one of them has been answered by the distinguished lawyers of the Senate heretofore, what shall we say when the last one is that our obligation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must be fulfilled in the mind of the English view or our title passes from us or becomes an impeachable title? It is on a par with the other proposition that the United States by not observing the five rules, from 2 to 6, would forfeit its title to its own canal. What a flimsy, fortuitous, hazardous, uncertain title they would have us believe it to be upon which we have expended uncounted millions, supposing all the time, sir, it to be ours—"entirely" ours, "exclusively" ours, "in perpetuity." Oh, Mr. President, let us not convict Hay and Roosevelt of a stupendous blunder and the whole of the American people as accessories after the fact.

Mr. President, look at it from another view, not from a merely legal point of view, not according to the construction which all courts would place upon grants and titles; but what have we done?

We paid $10,000,000 for this property. We agreed to pay $250,000 a year thereafter. We paid $40,000,000 for the rights of the citizens of France in the property. We have expended $400,000,000 for its improvement. We are putting millions of dollars into fortifications. We regard it as vital to the strategic defense of our Nation. We boast of it as the greatest engineering feat of civilization—ours, built and owned, controlled, paid for—and the highest judicial tribunal of the United States and the greatest judicial tribunal in the world says that the title is perfect. No American citizen would want a better title to his home.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] had said that the effect of giving to the treaty the construction which is contended for would be to make our title a conditional one regardless of the Panama Canal treaty, there would have been some reason for their arguments. If they had said that what we are seeking to do here is to impose a permanent servitude, a permanent easement, upon a most vital portion of our own territory, and in that respect and to that extent make it a conditional title or an international title, and that their construction of the treaty would have that effect, there would have been something in the contention. You remember that Sir Edward Grey says, in his note, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty imposes limitations upon the freedom of action of the United States. In other words, the sovereign powers are to be limited and circumscribed. What we would do if we did not have the treaty we can not now do. There is to be an impairment, a cutting off, a slicing down of our power of sovereignty over the canal, and that is the construction he would put upon the treaty. Our title now is perfect, exclusive, and unconditional, but their plan is to give England an interest in the title.

Mr. Richard Olney, former Secretary of State, and, needless for me to say, one of the great lawyers of this country, in his article upon this subject states the matter far more explicitly, and, of course, with greater authority, than I can state it; and I read it:

> The claim of Great Britain is, in effect, a territorial claim. The United States possesses no more costly, and, perhaps, no more valuable, piece of territory than the Panama Canal, and Great Britain's claim is that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty not only encumbers that territory with equal rights of use by all other nations but impresses upon it a servitude by which the United States loses the free use of its own canal for its own vessels.

It is just the same legal proposition as if you should come to me and say: "I want a right of way over your 160 acres of land, a permanent servitude, a perpetual easement." It is a territorial claim, and that is the effect of their proposed construction of this treaty.

All questions of domestic concern and of subsidies sink into insignificance, in view of the fact that we may settle those questions at our will. Mr. President, our control over our domestic commerce, our right to build up in our own way and as we choose our merchant marine, the vital importance of keeping alive competition between the great transcontinental railways and water transportation, these are vital questions of immediate, lasting, and everlasting concern to the people of the United States. Their disposition involves the highest exercise of sovereignty. Their disposition enters into the prosperity and the welfare of the entire American people. What we may do with reference to them may be wise or unwise. If wise, it will be continued. If unwise, we will discontinue it.

That, however, is not the question here. The question is whether we shall preserve untrammeled our right to deal with those questions as we would. The question is whether we shall be free in the future, should we change our minds and come to the conclusion that we wanted to change our policy, to do so; or shall we impose a servitude and an easement upon this property, a condition upon this title, which in the future will prevent our exercising the freedom of action which otherwise we might enjoy? Others can view it as they may, but to me to barter the sovereign power to absolutely control according to our free will and discretion our commerce, to encourage it, to turn it in this channel or that, to preserve untrammeled competition, is a stupendous and a most shortsighted, almost treasonable thing to do. But, sir, I flatter myself that no such bargain can stand; difficult as it may be, embarrassing as the act will make our task in the future, when the American people get a hearing they will right this wrong.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree, I think, with the Senator in his desire that we shall do nothing that will take away any right which we may possess, but this question occurs to me, on which I should like to hear the Senator: Why will we not be up against the same proposition at any time in the future if we undertake to repeal this law giving exemption to American coastwise vessels? If we should refuse to repeal now, and then should decide in the future that we wanted to levy a toll on American coastwise vessels, why would it not be said then, the same as the Senator is saying now, that by repealing the law we were practically doing what the Senator believes we are doing now?

Mr. BORAH. If we repeal the law we place a construction upon it which limits our power. If we repeal the law we place upon it, as these distinguished gentlemen say, the construction that it is an international title, a conditional title; or we place a construction upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that we have not the right to send our vessels through without the payment of tolls, because the statement of the President in his message, and the strong arguments made here, are to the effect that it must be repealed because it is in violation of the treaty. Having repealed it and placed upon it the construction that it is in violation of the treaty, I think we would be considerably embarrassed in the future to say that it was not in violation of the treaty. On the other hand, if we place upon it the construction that it is not in violation of the treaty; that we have the right to do so, that question is at an end; and if we can encourage some of our friends upon this side of the water to subside until England settles down on the proposition, it will not be raised again. It was not raised by England at this time. I have no doubt, had it not been raised here in this country, the matter would now be a closed incident. And when we reject this demand, the action will be forever interpreted as the deliberate and final judgment of the United States that we may send our ships through free or under charge as in our wisdom seems proper.

Mr. NORRIS. This question arises in my mind: Suppose we should be of the opinion that we had a right to pass the law that we have already passed—that is, to exempt our shipping from tolls—but we felt as an economic proposition that that was not good policy, how could we bring that about without subjecting ourselves to the criticism to which the Senator, I think, intimates we will be subject if we repeal this law now?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska does not want to place upon the treaty a construction which will embarrass us in the future?

Mr. NORRIS. No, I do not.

Mr. BORAH. There is just one way in which we can prevent that. We can either vote down this proposition and announce once and for all that this is the proper construction of the treaty as contended for by those who are against repeal, and make it a domestic affair; or, if you want to test upon this proposition those who are urging repeal, ask them to accept, instead of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. If they will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from California, in my judgment there will not be any consolation left to those who are in favor of the British view of the construction of the treaty; but the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina will not have that effect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. Just one word, and then I will yield to the Senator. I want to finish reading Mr. Olney's statement. I think it is entitled to exceptional consideration here.

After saying that this treaty encumbers that territory with equal rights of use by all other nations and impresses upon it a servitude, he says:

It is rights of that nature as to which both countries are especially sensitive and which both countries have been peculiarly careful to safeguard.

That is the construction which was placed upon this treaty, and if the President of the United States and those who advocate this proposition as contained in the messages and debates would put into the repeal bill such a provision as the Senator from California has offered in this matter, the Senator from Nebraska would not be in a position to take the position which I understand he desires to take in regard to it; but you are up against a case which another man made for you—you are going into another gentleman's parlor to be entertained according to the views of another.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe that I am going into the other man's parlor.

Mr. BORAH. That is what the fly thought.

Mr. NORRIS. But there were a good many flies that did not get into it. It may be that I will be fooled like the fly, but it seems to me that those of us who believe that the exemption of American vessels from tolls at Panama is wrong economically can vote for the repeal of the law without subjecting ourselves to the criticism that we are voting for the bill on the ground the President gives in his message. I will say to the Senator that one of the first things I did when the bill came to the Senate was to introduce an amendment, which I expect to offer, that sets forth my views upon the question. I recognize the embarrassing position we are in—that is, that we may vote for it for one reason and be criticized for voting for it for an entirely different reason.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska would not care about the criticism?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator from Nebraska, and the Senator from Nebraska would not care about criticism if he was voting according to his convictions. But that is not the point. It is not the fact that you will be criticized——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand.

Mr. BORAH. But it is the fact that you put a certain legal construction upon the treaty which we can not hereafter without much embarrassment get away from.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the position the Senator takes, and I think there is a great deal in it, but it seems to me that when an amendment is offered like the one I have presented or the one presented by the Senator from California, though I do not think he goes quite as far as I do in the one that I presented, we put ourselves then on record as voting for the repeal on the ground that we believe it is the proper economic policy for our country to follow.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska protects his own vote upon that proposition, but the Senator from Nebraska does not prevent the legal effect of that vote in the construction of the treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, assume——

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska can not in the future say, "I individually voted against that; I had in mind the proposition that I was voting upon the economic question," because this vote will be judged by the vote of the United States Senate and the Congress as a whole, as a body, and we will have put that construction upon it and the individual identity of the Senator will be lost in the proposition. It is just the same as if you were sitting upon the bench, where you have had the honor to sit, with two other judges, and where you would have your view upon the matter, and the other judges decided it not according to your contention and your view of the law but according to the majority, and the majority decision was the law.

Mr. NORRIS. But that does not do away with the proposition, in my judgment, if we should amend this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what a number of us are trying to do, and I hope we will have the assistance of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I will just simply say that I am very fond, in this kind of a proposition, of taking mine straight. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. It will be a good way to take it straight. The fact is that if you do not amend it you have got a two-edged sword. You can say we voted for this amendment because of the international aspect; some other man can vote for it because of the economical aspect. It seems to me that those who believe like the Senator from Idaho—and I think, in the main, I agree with him on the proposition he has presented—ought to put the proposition up to the world so that there can be no doubt about it. If we pass this bill with the limitation I suggested on it, there can be no doubt then in the mind of anybody why it was passed.

Mr. BORAH. I think I would be willing to have an interview with the Senator to this effect: If an amendment is presented which eliminates beyond all question the English interpretation of it, I should be willing to vote for it on condition that if we did not adopt it the Senator would be willing to vote against the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us make the agreement right now. That is just where I want to get. I am willing to make an agreement if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to hearing the agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. In the place of the Simmons substitute, and in the place of the committee amendment, put in this proviso:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed as a surrender of the right claimed by the United States Government to regulate the traffic passing through the Panama Canal, by giving to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and other vessels of the United States and its citizens, either partial or total exemption from the payment of tolls when passing through said canal. The protest heretofore filed with the Government of the United States by the Government of Great Britain against such a construction of the treaty of November 18, 1901, between said Governments, commonly known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is hereby recognized as presenting an international question suitable and proper for settlement by arbitration.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator leaves out the question of arbitration, I would vote, I think, for the other proposition. But permit me to say that I will not vote to arbitrate any question under any treaty we have which in my judgment involves the question of the sovereign powers of our Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to reach an agreement with the Senator. Suppose we limit the amendment to the first paragraph I read and say nothing about arbitration. Would that amendment be satisfactory?

Mr. BORAH. I think it would.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I only want to say that I am listening to the Senator reading and, of course, can not pass entirely upon the effect, but I would vote for any amendment if the amendment eliminates the British construction of the treaty if the Senator would join the American forces and vote against the repeal of the act. I will vote for any amendment which will eliminate beyond all question the contention that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in any way interferes with our right to pass our ships through the canal.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be glad to vote for that amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. BORAH. And if that fails, will the Senator vote against the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I will agree to furnish several votes to do that, providing the Senator will agree to furnish the same number of votes that will vote for the bill in case we adopt the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is perfectly safe.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let a call be made for volunteers.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before that agreement is made, the Senator from Nebraska has incorporated in his amendment one phase of this controversy. He has proposed that this legislation shall not have the effect, if adopted, of putting a construction upon the treaty with regard to our coastwise trade.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Iowa will observe that I did not put that limitation on it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear it.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read it again:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed as a surrender of the right claimed by the United States Government to regulate the traffic passing through the Panama Canal by giving to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States and other vessels of the United States and its citizens either partial or total exemption from the payment of tolls when passing through said canal.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear the last part of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I recognize that in this law we are seeking to repeal the exemption of tolls on the coastwise trade, and that is only one of the features that is involved, and that has taken up most of the discussion.

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to have the view of the Senator from Nebraska, and I apologize to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that I have kept him waiting. I yield to that Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, we have rather gotten away from the point I had in mind. I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that this question would not have been here at all, at any rate not now, except for the British claim as to the construction of the treaty. That is why the question is here. The President very emphatically in his address concludes by saying:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

Therefore, the appeal of the President is to repeal this law because we had no right to pass it, and if we accede to that request on the part of the President I for one do not see how we can contend in another year or two years that we have the right, because that would be manifestly to adopt a mere temporary expedient for an escape, real or fancied, from some diplomatic difficulty which now confronts the administration.

Mr. NORRIS. We would have to go to the bill for the reason——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My point is, if we vote for it we vote in the estimation of the world and in the estimation of Great Britain that we are without rightful power to make the exemption, and Great Britain can say to us with justice if we undertake to reimpose this exemption that we have not been candid.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps we could put some limitation in the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Great Britain could say with justice you have at the behest of your President accepted our view of it. We have done something in consideration of your yielding that point, and you can not now turn about and repeal it and adopt another construction.

Pardon me a word further. I would prefer the amendment which the Senator offers if it were put in an affirmative form; that is, not only that nothing herein is to be construed as surrendering the right, but that on the contrary we affirmatively assert the right.

Mr. NORRIS. I would be very glad to do that. The only object I have is to reach the same point, and I can modify it to meet the very difficulty the Senator suggests.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. In this very friendly understanding, how will the Senator from Nebraska take care of those of us who believe that we ought not to allow our own ships to go through free, but who do not believe that we ought to charge our own ships as much as we charge foreign ships? So far as I am concerned, while I doubt the economic policy of allowing commerce to pass through the canal free, it is to me in the highest degree unjust to burden that commerce with the same charge that we have put upon foreign commerce.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator's amendment would leave that entirely at our discretion.

Mr. NORRIS. I will simply say that I think the Senator from Iowa can be assured on that proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, together with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, we repeal the exemption provision and we also repeal the authority given to the President to charge less upon American ships belonging to American citizens than is charged to foreign ships belonging to foreign citizens.

Mr. BORAH. But it does leave to us entirely in future the proposition of a readjustment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly; but as an economic policy I am not in favor of repealing the exemption and repealing the exception, although I am in favor of putting some burden upon the coastwise commerce and upon foreign commerce carried in American ships.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to pass from the subject of the title with this observation in conclusion, that in my opinion there is no condition in this title whatever by reason of the fact that there is found in the Panama treaty, article 18, with reference to its being opened in accordance with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That does not inhere in the title and attach to it or impose any condition. If conditions should arise by which we should violate that treaty justly, or if we should, out of our own purpose—it would be a dishonorable and unjustifiable thing to do, and a thing which we never would do—it would not affect the title to the canal.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho for his opinion as to whether the clause in the Panama treaty that the canal shall be opened in accordance with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, whatever force is given to it, would give any additional right or set up any terms or establish any condition with reference to the operation of the canal which Great Britain could, by virtue of our treaty with Panama, insist upon.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Making my question a little clearer, I want to get the opinion of the Senator in the RECORD on that point. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, although by its terms it includes the United States with the other nations to be affected by these rules—and I am inclined to think when it specifies the conditions applying to belligerents such language used there necessarily includes the United States—it seems to be so absurd in its practical working that it has been abandoned by Great Britain herself, and that abandonment is based upon the proposition that the conditions have changed from those which were contemplated at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated, that having acquired sovereignty over the Canal Zone, these rules, for that reason, do not include the United States. Now, if we have been relieved of any obligation or any burden which might have been imposed by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty because of that change of position in the acquirement of the sovereignty, are those conditions reimposed?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not. It is a condition no one could take advantage of by forfeiture, and that has no place in this debate so long as the only party that could complain is not complaining.

Now, Mr. President, one other matter, briefly, before I sit down. There has been in this debate from the beginning what is called a question of good faith, or, rather, the proposition of bad faith upon the part of the United States generally toward its treaties. It has been quite freely circulated throughout the country, it has been stated here upon the floor of the Senate directly, indirectly, by suggestion, and by innuendo that the United States is noted for its disregard of treaties; that it stands quite the pariah among the Nations of the earth as unwilling to abide by any contract which it makes; and that it has justly acquired the reputation of being a bad, dishonest merchant, as it were, making contracts which it does not propose to fulfill.

This proposition, Mr. President, was first taken up by the English press. I do not want to be understood as assailing the great English nation or of doing that which would be considered as attacking Great Britain in mere virulence or feeling or passion, but I do want to call attention, Mr. President, to a few facts not for the purpose of criticizing Great Britain, but that we may know something of the reputation, the history, and the character of the United States for its assiduous regard for its treaty obligations.

Early in this controversy the Saturday Review, a very able paper published in England, said:

> We can not expect "to find President Taft acting like a gentleman." "To imagine," it says, "that American politicians would be bound by any feeling of honor or respect for treaties, if it would pay to violate them, was to delude ourselves. The whole course of history proves this."

The Morning Post, another paper, says, speaking of various infractions of treaties:

> This is surely a record even in American foreign policy, but the whole treatment of this matter serves to remind us that we had a long series of similar incidents in our relations with the United States. Americans might ask themselves if it is really good foreign policy to lower the value of their written word in such a way as to make negotiations with other powers difficult or impossible. The ultimate loss may be greater than the immediate gain. There might come a time when the United States might desire to establish a certain position by treaty, and might find her past conduct a serious difficulty in the way.

An English author, with more of deliberation and more of reflection than possibly might be attached to an editorial, said:

> Treaties, in fact, only bind the polity of the United States as long as they are convenient. They are not really worth the labor their negotiation entails or the paper they are written on. It is as well that this position should be realized, as it may save a great deal of fuss and disappointment in the future.

I would not call attention to those articles, Mr. President, if it were not for the fact that they have been taken up in this country by the press, stated practically in the same terms and sometimes in a more modified way, sometimes by innuendo and insinuation, but the atmosphere is permeated with the theory that the United States disregards its treaties.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator give us the authorities which he quotes?

Mr. BORAH. The last authority I quoted from?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Both.

Mr. BORAH. The first authority was from the Saturday Review; the second authority was from the Morning Post, and the third was from a book by Sir Harry Johnston, entitled "Common Sense in Foreign Policy," page 89.

I say, Mr. President, that I would not call up these matters if they were mere expressions of the English nation. We all understand the diplomacy and the astuteness and the far-seeing genius of England in accomplishing what she desires to accomplish. She is a great, powerful, dominant nation. We owe much to her for our institutions, for our original conceptions of personal liberty. We take a vast amount of pride in her literature, and we are in no sense approaching England at this time, nor shall we approach her in the future, with a desire of estranging any real friendly relation which exists between us.

But these matters, Mr. President, have been taken up in this country. They have been circulated throughout the United States. The literature has been sent broadcast, and thousands and millions of our fellow countrymen who are personally honest and most regardful of their contracts and their personal honor, who attach the same rule to their Nation and would see the same rule observed for their Nation, believe that hidden away in the chambers of our State Department and ensconced in our archives there is an amount of evidence as to our national disregard for our treaty obligations. I have heard Senators here say, with a good deal of feeling—and, in fact, I have studied their emotions to see whether it was for the stage or really came from the heart—that we must reverse our position with reference to our regard for treaties. I heard a distinguished Senator a few days ago, with a good deal of emotion, say that unless we changed our policy with reference to regard for our treaties the United States was entering upon a perilous destiny.

I would be glad, Mr. President, if these distinguished Senators or others would arise now, while I am upon the floor, and give to me the instances in which the United States has disregarded her solemn treaties. I would be glad to have a specification of this gratuitous insult to the people of the United States.

On the other hand, Mr. President, I stand here to assert—and if any man arises to challenge my position I have undertaken to bring the facts to the desk—that Great Britain has never had an important treaty with us that she has not repeatedly violated, and that the difficulty and embarrassment of the United States at the present time arises out of the fact that she has forgiven violations and overlooked obsolete treaties and accepted too often treaties after they have been disregarded.

Mr. President, I am not going to go into any detail, but begin away back in 1783, the first treaty that we made with that nation. It was violated with such insolence and persistence that the United States, a weak and struggling Republic, was compelled out of self-respect to withdraw the elder Adams from St. James, and for 13 years upon the great northwest border she maintained her posts in violation of the treaty, to the loss of hundreds of lives of our citizens, encouraged depredations of Indians, dealing in our fur trade, and taking advantage of our commerce, and refusing to account for the property which was carried off in violation of the treaty.

I quote here a letter from Benjamin Franklin, written to the President of the American Congress:

SIR: With respect to the British court, we should, I think, be constantly upon our guard, and impress strongly upon our minds that, though it has made peace with us, it is not in truth reconciled either to us or to its loss of us, but still flatters itself with hopes that some change in the affairs of Europe, or some disunion among ourselves, may afford them an opportunity of recovering their dominion, punishing those who have most offended, and securing our future dependence. * * * In these circumstances we can not be too careful to preserve the friendships we have acquired abroad and the Union we have established at home, to secure our credit by a punctual discharge of our obligations of every kind, and our reputation by the wisdom of our councils, since we know not how soon we may have a fresh occasion for friends, for credit, and for reputation.

Thomas Jefferson, in a letter to George Hammond, minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain, under date of December 15, 1793, said:

The provisional and definitive treaties, in their seventh article, stipulated that "His Britannic Majesty should, with all convenient speed, and without causing any destruction or carrying away any negroes or other property of the American inhabitants, withdraw all his armies, garrisons, and fleets from the said United States and from every port, place, and harbor within the same."

But the British garrisons were not withdrawn with all convenient speed, nor have ever yet been withdrawn. * * *

The British officers have undertaken to exercise a jurisdiction over the country and inhabitants in the vicinities of those forts. And they have excluded the citizens of the United States from navigating, even on our side of the middle line, of the rivers and lakes established as a boundary between two nations.

By these proceedings we have been intercepted entirely from the commerce of furs with the Indian nations to the northward—a commerce which had ever been of great importance to the United States, not only for its intrinsic value, but as it was the means of cherishing peace with those Indians and of superseding the necessity of that expensive warfare we have been obliged to carry on with them during the time that these posts have been in other hands.

By this treaty of 1783 England was to withdraw with all convenient speed, and without carrying away any negroes or other property, her armies and garrisons from the United States. She deliberately resolved not to carry out these stipulations. She found the Northwest posts convenient for trade, and thereafter, in flagrant violation of the treaty, refused to give them up. She also refused to make compensation for the negroes which her armies, in violation of treaty, had carried away. In addition to this and in order to make it less difficult to violate the treaties, she contemptuously refused to send a minister to this country. We had the self-respect to recall our minister, John Adams, and were compelled to witness her exercise of sovereignty over the Northwest and see her continue to stir up the Indians without a word of explanation. Gouverneur Morris, who was in London at this time, wrote to Washington that "they intend to keep the posts and without payment for negroes." England procrastinated and dallied and acted with the greatest disregard of our rights and never did live up to the treaty and in accordance with it. These things were in a measure elements in bringing on the War of 1812.

The action of the United States under such treatment was dignified but determined, and finally she secured her rights.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. What I desire to say to the Senator from Idaho is that exactly the same thing which the Senator describes as to the northwestern territory occurred on the line of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. The English never surrendered their military posts nor withdrew their commercial agents from that territory until after the peace which resulted from the War of 1812.

Mr. BORAH. Take the treaty of 1815. Mr. Gallatin informs us that at the time of the making of this treaty the English commissioners handed us a statement to the following effect:

We do not admit Bonaparte's construction of the law of nations. We can not accept it in relation to any subject matter before us.

The effect of this note was not appreciated at the time. But Mr. Pitt, Mr. Grenville, Lord Liverpool, and others had denied at all times the right of Napoleon to sell Louisiana to us, and had it not been, as it now clearly appears, that Jackson defeated so signally Packenham at New Orleans we would, through this deceptive note, have been compelled to deal with the question of our title to Louisiana. In addition to that, this treaty was violated in other respects for a number of years. The United States dealt with the matter as becomes a nation regardful of its honor and anxious to abide by its contract even when the other contracting party is derelict. In fact, sir, the War of 1812 was brought on through treaty violation.

Take the treaty of 1850, which I am not going to discuss today, but I am going to discuss it a little later with reference to its violation by Great Britain and with reference to the United States nevertheless dealing with it as having vitality when it came to take up the Hay-Pauncefote negotiation.

Take the treaty of 1871 with reference to the Welland Canal. For 21 years England insisted upon such an interpretation of that treaty as would enable her to favor her coastwise trade, notwithstanding the language of the treaty; and never until this day has she conceded the rights of the United States as a treaty obligation. Every single treaty that we have ever had with that great nation has undergone the same treatment at the hands of the United States. I can not recall a single instance in which the United States took advantage of those violations or disregarded its treaty obligations because of them.

I undertake to say, Mr. President, that there is no justification and no warrant for the charge that the United States is disregardful of its treaty obligations. There is not to be found in our history from the beginning anything which could give rise to such a charge. I do not contend that there have not been differences about treaties such as will necessarily arise between nations under any circumstances, but in no instance have those disagreements or misunderstandings arisen other than in a friendly way in interpreting the treaties as we are seeking to do to-day. The United States to-day—and I venture to say it without fear of successful contradiction—stands before the nations of the earth more sensitive with regard to her treaty obligations—I will not say "more sensitive," because that would perhaps be considered an invidious comparison—but as regardful of her treaty obligations as any other nation upon the face of the earth. It is a vicious, cowardly, pharisaical charge to lay at her door the indictment which has been made by her own citizens in this controversy. They belong to that class of citizens who feel the exhilarating effect or are swayed by the scintillating flavor of English notice; they add neither respect at home nor give standing abroad, for no man respects another who dishonors his home, and no nation or people respects one who impeaches without cause his own nation.

Mr. President, in justification of the defense of my own country and the honor of my own Government, let me call attention to another matter. In all of our treaties there is a clause of amity, of peace, and friendship.

In 1795 we ratified a treaty of amity, the first article of which declared:

> There shall be firm, inviolable, and universal peace and a true and sincere friendship between His Britannic Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the United States of America, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people of every degree without exception of persons and places.

Article 1 of the treaty which closes the War of 1812 reads as follows:

> There shall be a firm and universal peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people of every degree without exception of places or persons.

Notwithstanding these provisions, who will not recall in these days of unjust and unwarranted charges against the honor and integrity of this Government the fact that when it was dissevered and broken, when we were struggling with a terrific civic strife, when the question was whether or not the Republic would live, under the protection of the British flag ships were constructed and let loose to prey upon American commerce. Who will forget the moderation, the tolerance, the patience with which the sainted Lincoln observed the treacherous and duplicitous action of this great and powerful nation when we were upon the verge of destruction? And who can recall the history of this duplicitous transaction without passing an encomium upon the great Republic of the West?

Mr. President, England is a great, proud, strong, dominant nation. She is masterful in her resources, in her industrial wealth, in her intellectual power and her statesmanship. Her public men elicit our pride and engage our constant study. Her wealth of literature and the growth of her institutions are a never-ending source of pleasure and instruction to all men—she is English, but nevertheless England has never in all her virile history yielded a right or forfeited an advantage out of mere courtesy or consideration or in behalf of the so-called theory of international peace. We, of course, want no quarrel or strained relation with her or with any other power. But I protest most respectfully but most earnestly against this constant profession upon our part of shame and contrition for things which we are supposed to have done, but which as a people we have not done. Why this self-abasement, this vaunting humility, this constant bowing obsequiousness, this perennial, never-ending intimation of self-disparagement? Why is it necessary to stand before all nations on the earth lacerated with our own lashes? It is weak, it is cowardly, it elicits respect from no nation whose respect is worth while. It does not insure peace. It is not calculated to enhance friendly relations with other powers. We want to be just and honorable, but we want to retain our own self-respect. We are bound in good conscience and in all decency to be upright, but we are bound also to protect American property and American interests. Whatever is justly due under the contract made should be given, but I refuse to accept the proposition that we should sacrifice the rights of 90,000,000 of people out of a question of supposed courtesy to another nation.

But in a discussion where the subject of violation of treaties are concerned England should approach the bar in modesty and humility. Her record will not permit her to be imperious or critical—she should hesitate to lay charges of misconduct at the feet of other powers.

Now we stand here to-day not with a purpose to disregard a treaty, but contending for what we think is the right of the American people with reference to this canal. Such action can only be interpreted as a disregard for treaty obligations by those who would induce us to yield up something which the treaty does not call for.

Mr. President, I had intended to-day to go into particular detail with reference to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty upon this particular subject, but the lateness of the hour and the contention which has been had with reference to discussing other matters rather persuades me that I ought not to do so. But if the occasion presents itself, I am going at some time to present to the Senate the history of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty from two standpoints—first, to show how sedulously the United States adheres to every obligation which she makes in a treaty regardless of the manner in which that treaty is dealt with by the other signatory powers. The history of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty itself is an interesting history; and it is the highest compliment that could be paid to the United States for its sensitive regard for national honor. Secondly, I shall present the history of that treaty for the purpose of showing what consideration passed into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty upon the part of Great Britain. What did she have to put into that transaction? She had an obsolete and thrice-violated treaty.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires at this time to address the Senate on the pending question, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask that the agricultural appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, it is proposed to strike out line 25, in the following words:

> Chugach National Forest, Alaska, $16,330.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the reason for the offering of this amendment is that there has been a bill favorably reported to this body from the Committee on Territories for the abolition of this reserve. The same facts will be presented to the Senate on this question as would be presented on the question of the consideration of the bill providing for the abolition of the reserve. If in the opinion of the Senate the facts justify the abolition of this reserve, then Senators will vote for this amendment and subsequently vote for the passage of that bill. If those facts do not justify the subsequent passage of the bill abolishing the reserve, the Senate will vote against this amendment and will undoubtedly subsequently vote against the passage of that bill. It is therefore considered advisable to present this question at this time, when there is an appropriation provided for the upkeep of this reservation. In this behalf I ask that the bill for the abolition of this forest reserve be read, together with the report of the Committee on Territories thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 1887) to annul the proclamation creating the Chugach National Forest and to restore certain lands to the public domain, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the proclamation of the President of the United States made upon the 18th day of September, in the year 1907, withdrawing from the public domain certain lands and creating the Chugach National Forest shall be annulled.
> SEC. 2. That the lands contained in said Chugach National Forest, and not embraced in any other withdrawals, reservations, or appropriations, shall be and are hereby, restored to the public domain and become subject to settlement, appropriation, and disposition under the provisions, conditions, and restrictions applicable to such lands on such date and after such notice, by publication, as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; and no person shall be permitted to gain or exercise any right whatever on any occupation or settlement begun prior to such date, and all such occupations and settlements are hereby forbidden.
> SEC. 3. That this act shall in no way affect lands withdrawn for the conservation of coal.
> SEC. 4. That the present officers and agents of the Forest Service in charge of said Chugach National Forest shall be authorized to complete any contracts and settle up any unfinished business relative thereto.

The Secretary also read report No. 508 of the Committee on Territories, submitted May 12, 1914, as follows:

> Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1887) to annul the proclamation of the President of the United States made upon the 18th day of September, in the year 1907, withdrawing from the public domain certain lands and creating the Chugach National Forest, begs leave to report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.
> The committee had a complete hearing on the matter involved in this bill during the hearings on the Alaska railroad bill. Mr. Henry S. Graves, Forester and Chief of the Forest Service, testified fully with regard to the matter. From such testimony the committee finds the following facts:

The reserve contains 11,000,000 acres and blankets the whole coast of Alaska from Cook Inlet to Controller Bay. It contains only 8,483,000,000 feet of timber, which amounts to only 771 feet per acre. The timber is of an inferior grade, is unfit for export, and can not compete with the timbers of the United States. The only demand for such timber is for purely local use by prospectors, miners, and farmers in the development of the Territory. The amount of such timber annually used for such purposes will have little effect in diminishing the quantity of such timbers. The total amount sold by the Government during the last year for which we have report was only $4,037.18. The Forest Service seeks an appropriation of $16,000 in the pending agricultural appropriation bill for the maintenance of such reserve. The forest serves no purpose for the protection of watersheds, as the watersheds consist of eternal glaciers. The services of the Forest Service are not required to prevent the destruction of the forests by fire, because of the excessive rainfall prevalent in this region.

By reason of such facts, the committee believes that the maintenance of the said forest reserve conserves no good public purpose, while it is an interference with the proper administration of the other land laws of the United States, with the development of the Territory, and is an unnecessary expense to the Government.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I realize that in asking for the abolition of this forest reserve and in seeking to prevent an appropriation for its upkeep, I will be subjected to the suspicion of attacking a well-known conservation policy. I therefore feel that I am in duty bound to explain that I am not opposed to conservation; that I am not opposed to the conservation of our timber for the various purposes for which such timber is supposed to be conserved.

I want to impress upon the Senate that the conditions existing in this forest reserve are entirely different from those existing in most of the forest reserves of the United States. The forest reserve in Alaska does not serve the purpose of protecting a watershed for agricultural purposes, because those watersheds are covered with glaciers, which furnish an absolute supply of water practically at all times of the year. In Alaska forest reserves are not necessary for the protection of the watershed for another reason, namely, that there is such a great rainfall in that portion of Alaska that irrigation is never used in connection with agricultural pursuits; in fact, the problem will be to get away from an excess of water.

I believe that it will enlighten the Senate better to read a little of the testimony given by the Chief Forester of the United States with regard to the quantity and the character of the timber. I read from page 421 of the hearings, the testimony of Mr. Graves. The question was asked by Senator JONES:

Senator JONES. While those reasons, I can readily understand, might apply as the general policy, as to the particular situation those reasons might not apply. As I say, the committee was attracted by the statement made by Mr. Baldwin, who claims to know what he is speaking about, and who lives within the limits of this reserve. He says this—

Mind you, the attention of the Chief Forester is called to this statement of Mr. Baldwin:

This reserve covers thousands of square miles along the southern coast, more than 90 per cent of which is utterly destitute of timber, being barren slopes, glaciers, and mountains above timber line. Less than 10 per cent is covered with a scattering growth of spruce, hemlock, and cottonwood of inferior quality, practically all mature and largely supermature. Not a foot of this timber will ever be exported. In fact, a large part of the lumber used within the limits of this reserve is shipped from Puget Sound.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me there?

Mr. PITTMAN. Pardon me, until I finish reading this.

Mr. WARREN. I thought the Senator was going to read from the testimony of Mr. Graves.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am reading from the testimony of Mr. Graves at page 421.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is reading a statement from another party altogether.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator will kindly let me proceed, he will see that I am reading from the testimony of Mr. Graves.

Mr. WARREN. I have a copy of the testimony here, from which it appears that the Senator is reading from Mr. Baldwin's report.

Mr. PITTMAN. I beg to differ with the Senator. This is a statement that is being submitted to Mr. Graves for his answer; it is a part of the question of Senator JONES:

"It is only useful for local needs, and should be used by our people without undue restriction.

"Forest reserves are supposed to be created to provide timber for future generations, to attract rainfalls, to regulate stream flow, to prevent forest fires, and provide Government revenue.

"Let us take up these propositions in turn.

"First. What is the use of preserving timber that is falling down and rotting of old age for future generations?

"Second. As to rainfall, the area embraced within the limits of this forest reserve receives a rainfall of from 70 to 120 inches per annum. As over 90 per cent of this reserve is destitute of timber and the treeless Aleutian Islands to the west of us receive more rains than we do, the idea that the cutting of the timber needed by our people will have any effect upon rainfall is utterly absurd, etc."

I would just like to hear what you have to say in reference to that statement and suggestions made there by Mr. Baldwin.

Then comes the answer of Mr. Graves to that question:

Mr. GRAVES. That is a question of fact in regard to the extent and condition of the forest. As to the extent, I can only tell you what our reports show in the matter of the acreage it covers. There are 4,000,000 acres; a considerable portion of that undoubtedly is timber more or less patchy; it is not in a solid, compact body. As to the question of this all being matured, or overmatured, our records show that that is not the fact, but that there is a good deal of immature younger trees coming on. It has occurred to me that it might be of interest to the committee to see some photographs which were submitted with the report recommending the western addition.

Such was the answer made by the Chief Forester to the charge made by Mr. Baldwin, a resident for many years of the Chugach Forest Reserve.

Now, let us see further what Mr. Graves has to say on page 438 of the hearings. This is as to the character and amount of the timber:

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Could you make an estimate or have you ever made an estimate in round numbers as to the amount of merchantable timber within that reserve?

Mr. GRAVES. The latest figures—I have not got the report on which that is based—show that there are about 3,000,000,000 feet of mature and overmature timber reasonably accessible.

Mind you, only "about 3,000,000,000 feet of mature and overmature timber reasonably accessible."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On the 11,000,000 acres within the reserve?

Mr. GRAVES. Yes; and that the less accessible timber, including the timber which is classed as immature, but which is big enough for use, there is somewhere between 20,000,000,000 and 30,000,000,000 feet.

Senator JONES. I think Mr. Greeley said the other day that there was about 28,000,000,000 feet, estimating an average of 7,000 feet an acre for 4,000,000 acres.

Mr. GRAVES. About 3,000,000,000 feet of that is what would be classed as reasonably accessible. I have not the reports on which those figures were given. They came in connection with another official report which we have called for, looking to the estimates of all the timber in the national forests.

Now, let me call attention to this: Mr. Graves, in giving this testimony, places the total timber, including that which is accessible and that which is not accessible, that which is mature and overmature and not mature, between 20,000,000,000 and 30,000,000,000 feet. Mr. Graves has gone to Alaska since that time for the purpose of investigating conditions and reporting to this committee. The committee, under date of December 20, 1913, received a letter from Mr. Graves, after he had returned from Alaska. Unfortunately I have left that letter either at my office or at my house, but I will introduce it in the RECORD later. That letter, which is addressed to the committee, asks leave to correct his testimony as given in the hearings which I have just read. In this letter, which is written after a personal examination by him of this forest reserve, he states that he was in error in testifying that there was between twenty and thirty billion feet upon that forest reserve, and that a careful estimate makes it only 8,000,000,000 feet; in other words, his testimony that I have just read was an exaggeration of nearly four times the actual facts. If he states 3,000,000,000 feet out of 30,000,000,000 feet as accessible—in other words, practically one-third of it—we would have one-third of 8,000,000,000 feet as the accessible timber in all that 11,000,000 acres of forest reserve.

Does it not occur to Senators how absurd it is to attempt to protect that straggly little timber on over 11,000,000 acres of land, covering a barren coast of Alaska, which can never have any commercial value? It means less than a thousand feet of board measure to the acre; in fact, it means less than 500 feet of board measure to the acre. There is no inducement to anyone to go in there and attempt to gobble up that timberland, even if there were a law permitting such a thing; but I may state here, in passing, that there is no law in Alaska permitting a man to enter timberlands for timber.

Now, let us see what Mr. Langille, who made a report on this same territory for the Forestry Bureau, says. Here is what Mr. Langille says about that timber up in that country:

In a region so remote from the centers of civilization, its resources undeveloped, its inhabitants scattered throughout an almost untrammeled wilderness, wrestling with untoward circumstances in an effort to reduce to the needs of mankind a land which offers so little and demands so much, the question of creating a forest reserve does not present the arguments usually brought up where the preservation of watersheds and the conservation of the water supply is so vital to the interests of all the people, and it seems a far-fetched idea to seriously contemplate forest preservation where there is so little apparent need of it and so little to preserve.

That is the report of Will Langille, upon which the Chugach Forest Reserve was created.

Take that in connection with the testimony of the Chief Forester, that on that whole 11,000,000 acres of forest reserve there are only 8,000,000,000 feet of lumber. On 11,000,000 acres there are only 8,000,000,000 feet of lumber, including mature, overmature, and undermature timber—less than 500 feet of board measure per acre.

Now, let us take the testimony of Mr. Steele, a resident of Alaska, which was given in the presence of the representatives of the Forestry Department. It will be found at page 334. Here is what Mr. Steele says, questioned by Judge WICKERSHAM:

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Do you know what proportion of lumber in that country is imported, brought up from the south?

Mr. STEELE. I can only relate my own experience. In the past seven years I have used up there approximately three-quarters of a million feet of lumber in all kinds of buildings, in the construction of wharves, etc., and I have used of that three-quarters million feet less than 10,000 feet of domestic lumber, because we found it had no value to us. We could not use it.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Why? Because it has no substance or strength to it?

Mr. STEELE. No substance and no tensile strength. Even for our sidewalks and for interior finish and for rough lumber we use outside lumber.

Senator JONES. In other words, this timber is not suitable for building purposes?

Mr. STEELE. I would not give you 5 cents a thousand for it for building purposes. Our experience, Senator, was this: We first put up a little powder house at Prince William Sound, constructed of boards, doubling the boards, leaving cracks about 4 inches in width between the first tier of boards, then battening these cracks with 12-inch boards, and whenever we would get a driving rainstorm the rain would go right through those boards.

The next testimony on the subject of the character and amount of timber there is found at page 339 of the hearings. This is the testimony of Mr. Greeley, who was sent by the Forestry Department to testify as to the reasons for the creation and the continuance of this forest reserve. He was sitting there at the time Mr. Steele gave the testimony I have just read, and Mr. Greeley was then interrogated by Senator JONES, of the committee, as follows:

Senator JONES. You heard the statements of Mr. Steele with reference to that, did you not?

Mr. GREELEY. Yes.

Senator JONES. Do you think his statement was substantially correct?

Mr. GREELEY. I think it is substantially correct that it is not as strong as the timber in the Pacific Coast States, but I do not admit it is not usable for a good many purposes for construction.

Now, I want to give you the testimony of Dr. Brooks, in charge of the Geological Survey for Alaska, a man who has been in that country for years and who probably knows more about it than any other man in the Government service to-day. His testimony will be found at page 527. Senator WALSH, of the committee, is interrogating Dr. Brooks:

Senator WALSH. I should like to know whether it is so abundant and so placed as to invite the appropriation of the lands for the timber that there is on it, with a view to manufacturing and selling it?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; there is no timber in the Bering River field that has any value whatever except for the local use.

Senator WALSH. You could not manufacture it and export it?

Mr. BROOKS. No; I speak without reserve on that point. The only danger that I foresee there on the question of timber in that coal field is that some man—I do not know under what law—might take up certain tracts of timber and thus come close to monopolizing the supply that was needed for mining.

Next I want to refer to the testimony of Mr. Piper, the representative of the Department of Agriculture, who was sent to Alaska for the very purpose of examining the Chugach Forest Reserve, and who testified before the committee. His testimony is found at page 554. Here is what Mr. Piper has to say about the Chugach Forest Reserve:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Piper, do you know anything as to the grass land in the interior of the Kuskokwim Valley?

Prof. PIPER. I have no information about that valley.

Senator WALSH. You are familiar with the region covered by the Chugach Forest Reserve, are you not?

Prof. PIPER. I have been over the western portion of it pretty thoroughly and have been at various parts along the coast of the southern and eastern portions.

Senator WALSH. Describe for us the timber in the western portion of the Kenai Peninsula. You have told us about the timber on the eastern shore of Cook Inlet.

Prof. PIPER. The only timber I have seen along this eastern side [indicating] is a little timber along the shore. I am sure all that exists is close to the shore, except in the neighborhood of Seward. The timber about Seward is, I think, about the best timber that I saw north of Yakutat.

Senator JONES. That is not in the reserve, is it?

Prof. PIPER. No; Yakutat is not.

Senator JONES. I mean about Seward?

Prof. PIPER. Seward is not in the reserve. My recollection is that the amount of timber along the southern coast of the Kenai Peninsula is very small.

Senator WALSH. That is the southern portion of the Kenai Peninsula?

Prof. PIPER. That is the southern portion of the Kenai Peninsula. In the interior it is composed of fairly high mountains covered with snow and glaciers.

Senator WALSH. Our information is that it is not in the reserve.

Prof. PIPER. This portion [indicating]?

Senator WALSH. Yes.

Prof. PIPER. I am not familiar with the boundaries of the reserve.

Senator WALSH. Will you go on and tell us about the remainder of it?

Prof. PIPER. My recollection is that there is more or less timber—usually less—on most of these islands in Prince William Sound. I do not remember any timber about Valdez—a very small quantity surely, at most. In fact, my recollection of the whole south coast of the reserve is that there is a thin fringe of timber which does not extend any distance back from the shore line.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The mountains approach very near to the sea?

Prof. PIPER. The mountains approach very closely.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the character of that timber?

Prof. PIPER. It is a spruce timber, mostly, and some hemlock. I would consider none of the timber fit for saw timber, although perhaps my criterion is not a fair one. I am thinking of Puget Sound timber as a criterion. Certainly there is no timber in the Chugach Reserve region which I saw which could be compared to the Puget Sound timber, except some of it about Seward. I doubt if anywhere, unless timber were very scarce, that it would pay to cut those logs into boards.

That is the opinion of the representative of the Agricultural Department sent there for the purpose of examining into this forest reserve.

From those witnesses we have gained an idea of this forest reserve. In the first place, there is not sufficient forest there to warrant the Government in attempting to preserve it. Now, let us see what the uses were with regard to this.

On page 431 Mr. Graves testifies as to the reason of the creation of this forest reserve:

The CHAIRMAN. And the miner in seeking stulls, or "props," as you term them, would naturally want to pick the strongest timber he could get for that purpose, would he not?

Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And a railroad company in construction work would want to get strong, heavy ties?

Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be more apt to be the matured timber, would it not?

Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir. In some cases it might be the matured timber and in some cases it might not. It might be in some cases the matured timber would be larger than the actual requirements and middle-sized timber would be used.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator kindly inform us from what page of the hearings he is reading?

Mr. PITTMAN. Page 431.

Mr. LANE. I beg the Senator's pardon. In what year was this statement made?

Mr. PITTMAN. Last year. This hearing was held at the time we were having the hearings about railroads in Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. If the immature timber, being a few years younger than some of the others, was apparently the same size——

Mr. GRAVES. It would probably be mostly classed as matured timber. I was thinking more of the size.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no objections to the railroad company using this timber for ties in the advancement of its line through that reserve?

Mr. GRAVES. No, sir; I think it would be an admirable thing to do. I think it would be a broad point of view for the Government to take, to assist in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no objection to the miner using that timber for props and stulls?

Mr. GRAVES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who else uses it up there?

Mr. GRAVES. Not many people are using it up there. It is more for the future than local use.

Now we turn to Mr. Graves's testimony at page 429. So far the testimony shows that the only use of the timber up there is local use by people who are attempting to develop that territory. It shows that the only timber that would naturally be cut is the large, matured timber, such as he, as Chief Forester, is willing to sell them and does sell them. Consequently the character of cutting would be the same whether there was a forest reserve or whether there was no forest reserve.

Now let us turn to page 429 of the hearings. Mr. Graves is still giving his testimony. Senator WALSH is asking the questions.

Senator WALSH. And you would favor the amending of the forest-reserves act so as to permit railroads to exercise their right to take timber within the forest reserve free for construction purposes, just the same as——

Mr. GRAVES. I think that would be very proper in Alaska, because it is in line with the general feeling of everybody that the Government ought to assist in the development there in every way possible.

On page 465 Mr. Graves testifies further with regard to this matter, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Let us put it another way, then. There are a great many additional restrictions which do not exist with regard to the public domain under the general law. Is that not true?

Mr. GRAVES. There are some restrictions which do not exist under the public-land law, and which I think, in the main, ought to exist.

The CHAIRMAN. I am calling your attention to those, because the testimony shows what those restrictions are, and you have admitted them. You have the forest reserves; you have a reserve in which the timber has been used and is being used, and the only demand for the use of it is such as you yourself would permit. And I assume that would be the case all the time. As a general thing, the danger to a forest is that it will be gobbled up by the big institutions. Is that not true?

Mr. GRAVES. That is true in a great many cases.

The CHAIRMAN. If in Alaska the area of the timberland was simply withdrawn for location and just left open to general use by the public generally there, that would avoid that danger, would it not? In other words, in the next two years you do not imagine that there will be enough people in Alaska utilizing that for local use to materially affect it, do you?

Mr. GRAVES. I do not think this is a question of a year or two years, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking you about it. I am getting at it.

Mr. GRAVES. I do not think that in the next year or in the next two years the cuttings that will be made in there will be of any material, permanent harm to the forest.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been very extensive since you have been there?

Mr. GRAVES. Not since that.

The CHAIRMAN. And yet you have granted all of that they wanted, have you not?

Mr. GRAVES. Timber?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GRAVES. Yes.

So we find that the cutting there has not been extensive. We find that he has sold them all the timber they have asked for, and the result has been simply that the timber that would have been cut had there been no forest reserve there was cut under a forest reserve. There was just as much destruction to the forest, as far as the cutting was concerned, as if there had been no forest reserve there. The difference was that it was a useless expense to the poor prospector and miner who were trying to develop that country, and it was a useless expense to the Government that has constantly to appropriate money to cover the deficiency for the mismanagement of that reserve.

Now, let us take the testimony of Mr. Greeley with regard to that reserve at page 329. I repeat that Mr. Greeley was sent before the committee on the first occasion to represent the Chief Forester. Here is the testimony of Mr. Greeley with regard to the uses of that forest, on page 329. Senator WALSH is asking the questions:

Senator WALSH. Yes; but we seem to work at cross-purposes here. Of course, I conceive that the purpose of making a forest reserve of this was to preserve the timber, lest it should be uneconomically and wastefully destroyed. The danger of destruction by fire is evidently negligible. There is not any proposition to preserve the moisture that falls. That does not seem to be very much of a factor.

Mr. GREELEY. I think not.

Senator WALSH. What I wanted to know of you, was there any fear or dread of anybody going in there for commercial purposes, and, in the immediate future, cutting down large areas of that timber and carrying it away for export; and if there was not, why a reserve was ever created there?

Mr. GREELEY. I should much prefer to have the general question of policy, as to why that reserve was created, answered by the head of the department or head of the Forest Service.

Senator WALSH. That is what we hoped to get from you.

I wish to say that Mr. Greeley came before the committee as the representative of the Chief Forester; that it was by reason of an invitation by the committee to Mr. Graves, the Chief Forester, to come before the committee and tell the committee why that forest reserve ever had been created and the reasons for its continued existence. He wrote a letter to the committee introducing Mr. Greeley and stating that he was familiar with all of the facts, and that he would give the facts to the committee; and yet when the question is asked, Mr. Greeley avoids such question by saying that he would rather have it answered by the head of the department.

Now, let us take the testimony of Dr. Brooks, in charge of the geological department of Alaska. You will find it at page 529. You will recollect that Dr. Brooks knows more about the physical conditions of Alaska, about the land in this forest reserve, about its timber, about the rainfall, about all of the conditions surrounding that country than probably any other man in the department. Here is his final testimony:

Senator WALSH. Dismissing for a moment the possibility of owners appropriating the timber in the neighborhood of the Bering coal fields, or at any other point in this region where it might be valuable locally—eliminating that feature, what public purpose do you find to be subserved by the creation of that forest reserve?

Mr. BROOKS. I must confess that I have asked that question myself for a good many years, and I have yet to find a reply to that. I say this reluctantly, because I know there are those that were charged with not being conservationists because they objected to the Chugach Forest Reserve. I realize I should be careful in my statement.

Senator JONES. And you think you are a conservationist?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

There is the opinion of another member of the department. Following that I want to get the opinion of the representative of the Agricultural Department who was sent to Alaska to examine the Chugach Forest Reserve and see what his opinion is on the subject. I will refer you to Mr. Piper's testimony on page 555. Senator WALSH is asking the questions:

Senator WALSH. Mr. Piper, from your familiarity with the country, can you tell us of any public service that would be subserved, in your opinion, by the continuance of that forest reserve?

Prof. PIPER. I doubt if I can think of any, Senator. On account of the large amount of lignite coal which can be picked up on the beach about the Kenai Peninsula, there is no serious fuel problem. I should think there might be some reason for maintaining the reserve so as to protect the timber.

From the hearings so far it must be apparent that the usual reasons that urge the creation of forest reserves do not exist in the case of this reserve. There is no danger of a monopoly of the timber, for several reasons. In the first place, it is too scattered to be of value for commercial purposes. In the second place, it can not be exported, because the law of Alaska prohibits its exportation. In the third place, it is not fit for exportation, because it can not compete with the higher grade timber farther to the south. Again, the forests that are used for commercial purposes on the public domain of Alaska are subject to the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, and can be used only by being purchased through the Department of the Interior; and the sale of the timber, mind you, is entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. There is no danger, then, of monopolization of those forests.

You may say, "Why, then, throw it back into the public domain?" Throw it back into the public domain, for the reason that there are restrictions placed on people who are inside of a forest reserve, who are passing through a forest reserve, who are trying to live in a forest reserve, that do not exist on the public domain. That is the reason of it. The only use of that timber, according to the testimony of all of the witnesses, is a local use. The only use for that timber is by the miners and by the prospectors and by the farmers and by the people who are attempting to build roads, either railroads or wagon roads or trails, throughout that great country. Now is the time they need it.

As far as the high-grade timber is concerned, it is imported into that country to-day, and always will be imported there. The man who needs the timber is the man who is forging ahead. It is the man with nothing but his hands and possibly a grubstake who is trying to develop a little mine on those hills; the man who is trying to build a short tramway from his mine to some river; the man who is trying to build a home in that country; the man who is trying to establish a little merchandise store in the vicinity of some mining camp—those are the men who need it, and those are the men we want in Alaska, and that is the work we want done in Alaska.

Why, we are appropriating $35,000,000 to-day for the development of those things in Alaska, and yet we hesitate to give to the people who are going to develop that country the timber that stands at their hands to help them develop that country when the timber is not fit for anything else.

The Government does not desire to make a profit out of this timber. The Chief Forester himself testifies that they do not desire to make a profit out of it. He testifies that they sell all the timber to the very people that would use it if they were not there.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. This is now recognized as a national forest reserve, is it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it the intention of the Senator from Nevada to amend the bill so as to restore it to entry or restore it to the public land?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to say to the Senator from Nevada that it will be a long time before such legislation will go on this appropriation bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am very sorry the Senator objects to it.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; the Senator will object to it, because it is certainly legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. It occurs to me that the Senator misunderstands my position. I am not attempting to engraft the bill in regard to a forest reserve on this appropriation bill. I will state to the Senator that there is in the bill an appropriation of $16,500 for the upkeep of this reserve. I have offered an amendment to strike out that appropriation, in view of the fact that the Committee on Territories, which has investigated that forest reserve, believe that it will conserve no good public purpose to continue it. That committee has reported favorably a bill to abolish the reserve. If the Senate is willing to abolish the reserve, the Senate will also be willing to strike out this appropriation. If the Senate is not willing to abolish the reserve, it will certainly not strike out this appropriation; so it seems that the question might just as well be decided now as at any subsequent time.

Now let us see. We have gotten down to the question that the timber is only used locally; that only such part of the timber as would be sold will actually be used if the reservation is abolished; that there is no danger of monopoly; that it can not be entered at all; that if restored to the public domain, under the public-land laws it will still be subject to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior; and now we come down to the question, Why should the timber be in a forest reserve?

The only answer that you can come back to is, to protect it from destruction. The only destruction that the Chief Forester could find or imagine was destruction by fire. He admits there is no danger of destruction by usage, that there is no danger of destruction by insects, and so we come down to it, that the only danger of destruction is from fire.

Now, then, I want the Senate to determine whether or not there is any danger of destruction of that timber by fire. On page 422 Mr. Graves testifies with regard to this subject, and here is his testimony:

Senator JONES. Is there any serious danger from fire?
Mr. GRAVES. There have been very extensive fires there in the past, and there is more or less fire there every year.
Senator JONES. Within the limits of this reserve?
Mr. GRAVES. Yes; but that is confined to the western portion. The eastern portion and the central portion has a very heavy rainfall, and we might practically say there is no fire danger there.

Now, then, when we come down to the testimony of Mr. Graves, the only danger from fire at all is along the extreme western fringe on Cook Inlet. Senators who are familiar with the map of Alaska and the lay of the Chugach Forest Reserve, which extends three or four hundred miles to the east of Cook Inlet, know that this little fringe of timber along Cook Inlet is infinitesimal in regard to the area of the whole reserve. Yet it is only along the border of Cook Inlet that there is any danger of fire.

Now, then, where is the necessity of protection from fire? Why should the Government go to the expense of appropriating from $11,000 to $16,000 for the upkeep of that forest, when there is only a little fringe on Cook Inlet where there is any danger of fire at all?

Let me tell you further that if there were danger of fire it would not be the forest rangers who would protect it against fire but it would be the inhabitants of the country. The forest rangers have recognized that as a fact in Alaska, and they say that they would be powerless to protect it against fire except by the support of the people themselves.

Now, let us see further about the fires in that country. I turn to page 425 of Mr. Graves's testimony, and let us see what he has further to say:

Senator WALSH. Where did those fires occur?
Mr. GRAVES. Those are on the western portion. That is, the western portion over here [indicating].
Senator WALSH. That is, adjacent to Cooks Inlet?
Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir. That is the portion where there is any danger from fire. As I understand it, east of that there is not.

There we have the testimony showing the only danger of fire is right on the immediate coast of Cooks Inlet.

Now, take the testimony of Mr. Greeley, representing the Forestry Department, found at page 329. Here is Mr. Greeley's testimony:

Senator WALSH. Yes; but we seem to work at cross-purposes here. Of course I conceive that the purpose of making a forest reserve of this was to preserve the timber, lest it should be uneconomically and wastefully destroyed. The danger of destruction by fire is evidently negligible. There is not any proposition to preserve the moisture that falls. That does not seem to be very much of a factor.
Mr. GREELEY. I think not.

Again, take the testimony of Mr. Greeley at page 338:

Senator JONES. The only public interest, I gather from your testimony, that has been subserved up there has been to hold the title in the Government thus far?
Mr. GREELEY. I think that is the main thing. There is a small fire danger in that forest, but it does not amount to much.
Senator JONES. That amounts to nothing. That was not the purpose of it, to protect from fires, was it?
Mr. GREELEY. No, sir.

Mr. President, I think the testimony of the Chief Forester, of Mr. Greeley, and of Mr. Steele clearly demonstrates that there is no danger of forest fires in the Chugach Forest Reserve, and that the maintenance of the reserve is not essential to the protection of that forest against fire; that it is an extremely wet country, and that the rainfall is from 70 to 120 inches a year; that the watersheds are covered with eternal glaciers; that in summer time there are pouring down torrents of water through every gulch in all that country, and that on account of these torrential streams that are falling from every gulch there is no danger from fire.

Then why have a forest reserve there? What purpose does it serve? There is no doubt that the forest reserve must impose some restrictions upon the people within its borders. There is no doubt that it is necessary to go to a ranger to get a permit to cut any timber whatever to use for a commercial purpose. There is no doubt that every settlement within that reserve, every squatting upon the land, the mere pitching of a tent in the absence of a permit, are all trespasses against the Government. There is no doubt that whenever a little town springs up at the mouth of one of these gulches adjacent to a mining camp every man who settles there and builds his home and builds a store and goes into business is a trespasser against the United States Government until he obtains a permit from the Government.

I know you might say the Government would be lenient in those matters; that the Forestry Department wants to be lenient in those matters. I want to show that the facts are that time and again the Forestry Department has interfered with settlements in the District of Alaska that were started and were growing in natural places for settlements. The very history of that forest reserve for the last seven yea. is full of injustice and oppression to the people who have been trying to develop that country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is the Senator prepared to furnish specific instances at this time of those acts of oppression and injustice?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir; I would be glad to do so, but I really did not consider——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like very much that the Senate might be informed, if the Senator would do that.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will furnish them to the Senator. I do not desire to make it a part of my remarks for the reason that it is only incidentally bearing on this subject.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose it is bearing on the subject, otherwise the Senator would not be discussing it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to say to the Senator that I would not consider the inconvenience nor the mistreatment even of people by a ranger as sufficient justification for abolishing a forest reserve, but I do say that the inconveniences and the obstructions that are offered and the mistreatment of people in a reserve that is unnecessary is an element to be taken into consideration, and in a few minutes I want to read testimony bearing on that subject.

I will take up a few of those subjects with the Senator from Washington, although I did not intend to go into that matter, because, as I said, I do no consider that it is entirely material to this subject. In fact, it has been a matter testified to before the committee, and I believe there are letters before the committee; but there is some testimony which I will read as I go along.

On page 444 Mr. Graves testifies as follows:

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Suppose a man wanted to go in there where it is reasonably good agricultural land to take a homestead. What is the modus operandi of getting a homestead in a forestry reserve?
Mr. GRAVES. He would make an application for it—for the area—and it would be finally given to him under our forest-homestead act.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. He could not make a legal settlement until that is done, could he?
Mr. GRAVES. He could not get a title to the land.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; I did not ask you that. I asked you a plain, straight question—if he could make a legal settlement under the homestead law until after he had your permission?
Mr. GRAVES. His occupancy as a law proposition would not be legalized until he had been given the permission from us.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. So that to that extent the homestead law has been annulled, has it not? He has not free permission to go on the public lands any more to make a settlement?
Mr. GRAVES. Not without permission.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. There is such a thing as a squatter's right—a possessor's right. He would not have that at all, would he?
Mr. GRAVES. No, sir.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. He would be a trespasser if he went out and cut some of these little trees to build a hut? Is that not correct?
Mr. GRAVES. If you wanted to make him out that way.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Is not that what you would make him out under the law?
Mr. GRAVES. I think we could make him out that under the law if that was our disposition.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. If you complied with the law as you understand it, you would do that?
Mr. GRAVES. I do not believe that would happen.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. If he wants to take a homestead he can not first make a settlement, but he has got to apply to the Forestry Service? Is that correct?
Mr. GRAVES. Yes.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. You have blanks for him to do that on?
Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. How long does that take?
Mr. GRAVES. Depending a good deal on circumstances and what season he makes his application.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.
Mr. GRAVES. All he has got to do is to send it in to the supervisor by mail.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Where does he get his application?
Mr. GRAVES. From the rangers.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. How does he get a description of the land that he wants?
Mr. GRAVES. The ranger goes out and looks it over with him, lays it out with him, and makes a preliminary survey. He can take the land by metes and bounds that way, and that constitutes his location.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. The whole thing, practically, is under the charge of the ranger that goes with him?

Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Then he sends his application where?
Mr. GRAVES. He sends that in to the supervisor.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Where is the supervisor?
Mr. GRAVES. The supervisor of the forest is at Ketchikan. That is the headquarters.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. The supervisor gets that application. What does he do with it?
Mr. GRAVES. Then he receives the ranger's report on it, and sends it to the district forester for recommendation as to listing or not.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Where is the district forester?
Mr. GRAVES. At Portland. He passes his recommendation on to me; and a request is made to the Secretary of the Interior to open this land to entry.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Suppose there is some little question as to whether the lines run north, east, south, or west, or some question arises, so that it has to go back?
Mr. GRAVES. There might be a delay on that.

Here is further testimony on this subject on page 447—Mr. Graves still on the stand:

Senator WALSH. Just a moment before you pass that. Mr. Graves, take a man who feels as if he would like to go out on one of these rivers or creeks, we will say, 8, 10, 15, or 20 miles from the coast at Cook Inlet. About how long would it be in the ordinary course of events before he would be able to get the ranger to come and look the ground over, and the ranger would go back and report to the forest supervisor, and the forest supervisor would be able to report to the district supervisor, and the district supervisor would be able to report to the office at Washington, and the office at Washington would send the report back through these various channels until it reached the man?
Mr. GRAVES. That would depend upon the season of the year when he made his application as to whether he could get in and look at the land. But if he made an application in early summer, during the field season, our men could get out. Our aim is to reduce the time of the application. The time until the papers are in the hands of the Interior Department is aimed to be within 60 days. Sometimes there are delays on that.
Senator WALSH. You are speaking about Cook Inlet region?
Mr GRAVES. No; I am speaking in general. On the Cook Inlet region—I am afraid I can not give you a time answer on that. I do not know how long it would take.
Senator WALSH. About what time in the year would the forest ranger be able to get into that region in view of the fact that it is covered with snow in order to make an examination of the land?
Mr. GRAVES. Just as soon as the snow is off the land—from the middle of May on. Would not that be about the time that the country opened up there?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; on the lower levels.
Senator WALSH. Say about the middle of May. About what time in the fall would it be ordinarily covered again?
Mr. GRAVES. I suppose in the middle of November or early in December. A good deal of this lower land corresponds a great deal in climate, so far as I understand, with a good deal of our northern climate—say, our northern New England climate.
Senator WALSH. In the first instance, suppose he went up Kanai River 15 or 20 miles, and found a place there that he thought would be eligible to him to make a home for himself and where he could rear a family, about how far would he have to go to find one of these five forest rangers in the forest reserve?
Mr GRAVES. He could write to the forest ranger.
Senator WALSH. Where would he be stationed?
Mr. GRAVES. I do not know where all the stations are there. I have not got the record of all the stations.
Senator WALSH. You do not know?
Mr. GRAVES. No.
Senator WALSH. And considering the extent of this forest reserve, with five forest rangers on it, 100 miles of travel would perhaps be a moderate estimate as to the distance?
Mr. GRAVES. By water?
Senator WALSH. Any way.
Mr. GRAVES. If it included travel by water, I think that might possibly be the case.
Senator WALSH. His letter would have to go 100 miles to the forest ranger, and the forest ranger would have to go 100 miles, we will say, to make the examination. He could not possibly, starting in the month of May, with the means of transportation, get any filing in that year, could he, Mr. Graves?
Mr. GRAVES. I think it is quite possible that the land might not be actually opened to entry that year.
Senator JONES. If it resulted in any wrong or the ranger's report was not entirely satisfactory, it would have to be corrected the next year, and then probably run over another year?
Mr. GRAVES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?
Mr. PITTMAN. I do.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada, for my own information, is it not the upshot and the long shot of this entire business to this effect, that no American citizen can obtain a homestead in Alaska? Is not that about what it comes to?
Mr. PITTMAN. That is about the condition it is in. As I have said, I have been reading from the testimony of Mr. Graves to show practically how impossible it is for a homesteader to get any action on a homestead anywhere in that part of the world.
Mr. WILLIAMS. By the way, if the Senator will pardon me, I will add that it has been the American policy from 1862 down to now to give American citizens homesteads in the public lands.
Mr. PITTMAN. I wanted to read in this connection the testimony of Judge WICKERSHAM, Delegate from Alaska, who has lived 18 years right in that section. I can not place my hand on it just at present, but he substantiates what I have already claimed about the difficulties of a homesteader, the difficulties of a settler in that forest reserve under any and all conditions. Judge Wickersham states that the experience in Alaska has been that it is always impossible to obtain a settlement in those forest reserves.
In part Mr. WICKERSHAM said:

Mr. WICKERSHAM. As the representative of Alaska, I say to the committee that the people in those forest reservations in Alaska have long since learned that it is a question of years to secure any result in the way of action on applications for homesteads, with the probability that they will be refused; it has resulted in keeping many people away from these great forest reservations and has practically depopulated that part of the country, except in the towns. And as to this particular reservation, the Chugach Forest Reservation, I want to say to this committee and to Mr. Greeley, as the representative of the forestry reserve, that it is a shame that such a reservation should be maintained there. It is a fraud upon the people and a fraud upon the forestry reservation, for there is not anything there that is worthy the forestry reservation maintaining it as a forest reservation, and it lowers the forest service in the opinion of the people, who really favor proper forest conservation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the Senator will admit that the process is exactly the same in Alaska as on any other timber reserve. They have the same trouble with them all.
Mr. PITTMAN. I am satisfied that the Senator is correct in that; they have the same troubles; and I want to ask the Senator if he does not know those same troubles that I have spoken of exist in the western part of the United States?
Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And in Wyoming.
Mr. PITTMAN. In Wyoming; in the Senator's own State.
Mr. WARREN. Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to refer to me?
Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir; I asked the Senator if the same obstruction to settlement and the same administration of the forests do not exist within portions of the Western States?
Mr. WARREN. The entire argument which the Senator from Nevada has so ably presented applies to all of us alike, with certain reservations as to a rainy season of greater length in one part than in another. Of course, when the Senator is through—I do not want to interrupt him—I may have a few words to say only as to this argument. I think this argument would be very pertinent on the bill which the Senator from Nevada has reported from his committee; but, like "the flowers that bloom in the spring" referred to in the Mikado, it has "nothing to do with the case," as to this proposed amendment to an appropriation bill.
Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that the Senator from Wyoming, having been so long a member of the Appropriations Committee, does not desire any attack on the report of the committee. But we are faced with this situation. I will state to the Senator: At this time the Government is asking for an appropriation of $16,330 for the upkeep of this forest reserve, and the Senate committee having jurisdiction over the question has already reported to the Senate a bill providing for the abolition of this forest reserve. It seems to me that under such circumstances the Senate would take notice of the act of that committee and would not proceed to appropriate more money for that purpose on this Agricultural appropriation bill.
Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask the Senator from Nevada whether or not there is a unanimous report on the bill to which he refers?
Mr. PITTMAN. The report was approved by every member of the committee who was then present. There were some of the members of the committee not present, though I will state that there was a quorum present.
Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from Nevada has suffered in his committee as has every other chairman of a committee. He did not have a full committee at any time.
Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know that we ever had a full committee.
Mr. WARREN. Now, I will ask the Senator, a little out of the line of his argument, where would we be in passing these various appropriation bills if every Senator present who had introduced a bill and hoped to have it passed, changing the law, asked us to take cognizance of that fact when he simply had a report from his committee to shape the appropriation bill beforehand for it? He will see at once that we would be in a condition of chaos. The Senator can not possibly get his bill passed for a month yet, and by that time the estimates may be made up for another year, and, of course, we could then take care of it in a general way by having the law repealed and the appropriation ended from the date of the passage of the bill.
Mr. PITTMAN. I want to state that whether the bill abolishing the Chugach Forest Reserve is ever passed or not, the forest reserve will be just as well off with those four rangers out of it as it is with them there; and it is costing the Government $16,330 to give those four rangers a job there, when they serve no other purpose than to interfere with people who are trying to develop that territory. That is my theory about it. This action is not entirely dependent on whether we pass the bill abolishing the forest reserve or not, but the time has come to cease appropriating money for useless purposes.

I have attempted to show that the existence of that forest reserve is not justified upon any theory of conservation whatever. If they can show me one theory in favor of maintaining those rangers in that forest reserve, from the facts in this case, I shall immediately cease my argument in the matter; but, as I have said before, we can not find any. I have never heard anyone give a reason for their continuance there. The Chief Forester was asked to give a reason. A letter was written to him telling him that it had been charged that there was no reason for the creation of this forest reserve and no reason for its continued existence. We wanted him to come before us and tell us why it was created and why it should continue to exist. Instead of doing so, he sent to us one of his clerks, who, he said, knew all of the facts. Then, after we had taken his testimony, this clerk said, in answer to the question why had this forest reserve been created, "I would rather have you ask those above me." Then, when we asked the representative of the Agricultural Department who was sent to Alaska to investigate this forest reserve what good purpose this forest reserve conserved, he said, "I do not know." When we placed upon the stand Dr. Brooks, the geologist in charge of Alaska, who knows every foot of that forest reserve, a man who is a conservationist, and a man who does understand his business, and asked him what good purpose this forest reserve would conserve, he said, "I have asked that same question many a time, and I have never had an answer to it. I do not know."

The Chief Forester went to Alaska, after he had been examined before the committee, after he was chided by the committee for not giving the facts to the committee in defense of that forest reserve, for the purpose of securing facts to justify the creation and continuance of such reserve. On his return he gave no further reason for the continuance of the reserve, but in a letter to the committee was compelled to admit that there is only 8,000,000,000 feet of timber on the reserve instead of 28,000,000,000 as testified to by him.

I have said there is not any excuse whatever for that reservation; it is a farce; it is a reflection on the whole conservation policy; and it is breaking down the conservation policy of this country. As a conservationist, I am opposed to it, and I am opposed to letting it stand.

The testimony of the Chief Forester shows that there are no watersheds upon which it is necessary to conserve the water, because there is no agricultural land to be irrigated and the hills are covered with eternal glaciers. His testimony shows that that condition protects the reservation from fire; that there is no danger of fire anywhere in those 11,000,000 acres of land, which extend along the coast for 400 or 500 miles, except on the extreme west of the fringe of Cook Inlet. The fires there occurring, according to his testimony, have been inconsequential.

Then why are those forest rangers there? What do they do? What purpose do they serve? You could take four or five men out of that forest reserve and the only people who would ever miss them would be the people on whom they have been imposing, and they would be glad to miss them. That is the condition. Read this record here when you get time and see the treatment which the railroads that have been trying to build up that country have been receiving. By act of Congress they were granted the timber necessary to make ties on which to lay the rails. That statute was violated by the Forestry Department. They confiscated the ties which the railroad people had cut, and then they did not sufficiently care for them to prevent their being swept into the streams and absolutely lost. It caused the loss of thousands of dollars' worth of property there in violation of the statutes of this country. The representatives of the Forest Service were questioned on that subject and asked if they did not know they were violating the statute of the United States, and they replied that that was an open quesion to be determined by the courts, and yet they took no steps to determine that question.

How much timber are they selling? They sold $2,500 worth last year, and the expense of maintaining and protecting it was over $13,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And, if the Senator will permit me, it was sold probably to men who in all equity and justice ought to be entitled to possession of it for nothing.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no question about that; in fact, Mr. Graves himself testified——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That was an imposition.

Mr. PITTMAN. That he would like to see those very men get that timber for nothing.

There was no reason for the creation of this forest reserve and there is no reason for its continuance. I am sorry to hear my distinguished friend from Wyoming really making an argument which may defeat this proposition simply because of some of his theories of legislation. I believe that he wants to see that land restored to the public domain. I know that he knows just as well as I do how those who are traveling over and settling upon the public domain are interfered with by forest reserves; I know that he knows that there should be good cause for such interference or it should be removed; and I am sorry to have him say at this time, "Let this appropriation be made; let us waive this question as to whether there is necessity for it and at some future time take up the question as to whether or not we will abolish that forest reserve." I want to beg him to cut off this expense; I want to beg him to take those useless men out of that reserve as the first start toward giving an opportunity for the development of Alaska. If he does that, the passage of the bill reported by the Committee on Territories will follow. If he kills this amendment, the chances are that the passage of the bill will never be accomplished; and I know he wants to see the bill passed.

The whole country is trying to develop Alaska. We have appropriated $35,000,000 for the purpose of building railroads there. We want people to go in there and develop its mines and develop whatever agricultural lands can be developed; we want people to establish homes there, to live there, and settle the country; we want them to come out of our congested cities and go up into that country and add to the production of the necessities of life, and by that means reduce the cost of living. I want to say that, in conformity with that policy, we should remove every restriction—at least every unnecessary restriction—from the people who go to that country for that purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to state to the Senate what are the obstructions thrown around the location of mining claims within forest reserves in continental United States and in Alaska?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will state that when you locate a mining claim within a forest reserve and you attempt to cut timber on your own mining claim for the purpose of developing your own mine, you will be in danger of having a forest ranger come to you and say, "Stop cutting that timber," and when you ask him why, he will say, "Because that is not a mining claim"; in other words, the ordinary ranger constitutes himself the judge as to whether or not there is a sufficient discovery of ore to warrant the location of a mining claim.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And is not that true even though the full amount of $500 has been expended upon the claim?

Mr. PITTMAN. It does not make any difference how much has been expended; those rangers arrogate to themselves the right of judging those questions.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a suggestion, we have appropriated $35,000,000 for the purpose of developing Alaska's resources, and we are now proceeding to appropriate $16,000 to prevent that development.

Mr. PITTMAN. The statement of the Senator from Arizona is concise and absolutely correct. We are inviting homesteaders to go to Alaska, and yet we are placing a blanket 300 or 400 miles along the coast to prevent them from finding a place at which they can settle or even squat. We are inviting miners to go to Alaska, and yet we are withholding all of the facilities of settlement and transportation. The whole thing seems to be absolutely opposed to the policy of the Government in regard to settlement at the present time; and I can not conceive for one moment why this body should appropriate money for the upkeep of rangers in the Chugach Forest when there is absolutely no necessity for them.

I know that it comes down solely to the question as to whether this matter shall be contested at the present time in this form or whether it shall be contested on the passage of the bill itself reported by the Committee on Territories.

All the facts are before the Senate just as they would be if that bill were up for passage. If the facts presented are sufficient when that bill comes up to pass it, they are sufficient at the present time to prevent the appropriation of useless money. If that forest reserve can serve no beneficial purpose, then the Senate should not do any affirmative act toward its upkeep.

I want to say to you that those who are presenting this matter are presenting it sincerely and earnestly. We have studied the question for years; we have given it careful investigation before the Committee on Territories; we know that this forest reserve does blanket all of that portion of Alaska which to-day we are starting to develop; that we are taking out of the hands of the Government and placing in the hands of the forest reserve the very territory we are trying to develop. That is what we are doing.

There is no danger of that forest being destroyed. That land can not be entered as timberland; that timber can not be purchased except from the Secretary of the Interior, and it is entirely within his discretion to determine to whom he shall sell it. All we want is to give a fair opportunity to the people who go into that country, and we want to prevent this Government from appropriating useless sums of money for forest reserves that should have no existence.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely want to say, if the Senator will yield to me for a few moments, that I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has said. I have also listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of a number of Senators from the far West and the Northwest in connection with this question. It seems to me that it reduces itself about to this: That there are a lot of men "drest" as bureaucrats "in a little brief authority," most proud of what they are most ignorant, their own glassy essence, who are cutting fantastic capers in the face of high heaven, to quote, with some variation, the words of the Bard of Avon, while they construe law as they please and override it when they will.

It seems to me that there are a whole lot of people in the United States who imagine that conservation means reservation, when very frequently conservation does not mean reservation at all, and it seems to me that this is one of the cases where it does not.

Of course, I am in favor, and I think every patriotic man is in favor, of reversing to a certain extent the past policy of the United States Government by means of which the public resources were wasted. We are in favor of conserving those resources, but we are not in favor of reserving them whether their reservation conserves or not, and it seems to me this is a case where a reservation does not conserve. I wanted to say that much.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to beg the pardon of the chairman of the Agricultural Committee for saying anything at this juncture, for he has been long suffering, and he has been, I might almost say, tormented day after day and week after week in engineering through his great supply bill, and about everything on earth has been aired here on the Senate floor in extenso in connection with the Agricultural appropriation bill.

I want to say to my good friend from Nevada that he has made a splendid argument against conservation, an argument that he can use when his bill comes up for its passage; but it strikes me that he has both proved too much and too little. He has proved in his remarks that this forest is not worth a copper, and yet he has proved that it is indispensable to the settlers, and that it is being wickedly reserved from the deservin; people who stand ready to use it.

I agree with the Senator, so far as this: I am for conservation where there is real forest timber or a chance to grow it. I am against this whole forest-reserve system, so far as including mile after mile that has no timber now and no promise of any is concerned.

I do not discover from the testimony anything that differentiates that forest from the others. We have a forest reserve laid out in Alaska that is totally and wholly in the possession of the United States. The laws of the United States prevail there. Appointees from the United States execute them. It is public domain. These reservations are made. Coal is reserved, and other minerals. The United States ought not in any way to suffer from its own acts. If it is best for the United States to throw open that reserve, all that has to be done is to knock at the door of the President and ask him to order that reserve opened. The law provides that the President of the United States can create forest reserves and can set aside forest reserves. Congress has nothing to do with it. On the other hand, if we should repeal this act, if the Senator should have his proposed law passed and it should be signed, the very next month or the next year the same reservation could be made by a President of the United States. You have got to go deeper than that in the legislation.

Here is the condition, however: The Forestry Department have asked for an appropriation. It has come up in the regular way. It has been ingrafted into the bill by the House, and it is before us, one of perhaps one hundred and thirty-odd forest reserves. There is no more reason why that one reserve should be cut out—not as much, in my mind—than there is why all of them and every one of them should be cut out.

What is the effect of cutting the appropriation out? You have not changed the law a particle. The reservation exists just the same. The difference is that if we fail to appropriate for this reserve if a man wants to homestead he has got to come to Washington in order to reach the forestry officials, where in the other case he would have representatives from the Forestry Division there on the ground. It is putting the cart before the horse to withdraw the appropriation before a bill has passed annulling the reservation.

The Senator has made a report on behalf of his committee, and he is honest enough to say that it is unanimous as far as he was able to get at members of his committee, which of course does not include all. It is embodied here in a calendar that is in a more congested state than I have ever seen the Senate Calendar in my service in this body. If we go on in the manner we have been doing, we have no possible chance of reaching that bill at this session, even though the session may run until the 30th day of November.

Should we pass it, however, what then? It then goes to the House, and there goes to another calendar, a Union Calendar, which may be reached in the short session, but there is hardly a chance in a thousand that the bill could pass in the present Congress. In the meantime you have withdrawn the only method you have of allowing people to take some part in that forest reservation in the way of homesteads or in cutting timber, because you have denied them the money for upkeep and management.

You say there are no trails there. We are appropriating this money to construct trails so that men can get in there. The law provides that a man, in order to make a home or to do any mining, can get all the free timber he wants for the purpose, but he has to go through the formula of applying or reporting to the forestry department. So I say if we go to work and take off the appropriation we remove the only guard and ready relief there is. We absolutely tie it up, just as coal is now tied up. A man may stand on his claim where the vein of coal is 60 feet deep lying under his claim and not be allowed under the law to get enough of it to make a camp fire. We are importing coal from Australia and other countries for our war vessels when we have tried in ships of the Navy the coal of Alaska and find it efficient. We have not the legislation yet to open up this coal. Why should we trifle with forest reserves when far greater questions are begging for settlement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator long enough to ask a question for my own information?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I confess with due humility my ignorance to a large extent regarding these matters; but suppose the motion of the Senator from Nevada is agreed to, does not that necessitate a proclamation upon the part of the President restoring this given area to the public domain, and does not that immediately result in entitling everybody to make a homestead entry upon this part of the public domain?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Mississippi is laboring under the same mistake that I presume a great many other Senators are, and into which the Senator from Nevada has very ingeniously led them. The matter before the Senate, and the only matter that can be decided now, is, Shall we allow the regular appropriation for the care of that forest reserve? If the Senator had taken his bill and presented it here as an amendment to this appropriation bill, then the whole matter would have been before us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, if the Senator will pardon me one moment longer, if the appropriation to take care of this given area as a part of the forest reserve is defeated, then does not that area become a part of the public domain?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. It still remains a reservation either until legislation opens it or until the President makes a proclamation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator from Nevada ought to strengthen his motion by adding to it the words that it shall become a part of the public domain.

Mr. WARREN. Ah, but the Senator is wise enough to know that that would be general legislation and would be subject to a point of order. The Senator seeks to use the Senate at the present time as a lever to reach under and pry out his bill later on. He says those of us who vote against this amendment would vote against his bill. That is an assertion that does not look reasonable to me. There are many men here who will vote against the proposition of establishing forest reserves who will not undertake to set the example that when an appropriation bill comes in here every bill on the calendar must be considered as if it were going to pass, and cut out here and add there in the appropriation bill accordingly, regardless of existing statutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if the Senator will pardon me, practically, if we cut off this appropriation, will not that necessitate a proclamation by the President treating this given area in a different manner?

Mr. WARREN. Why, Mr. President, it would not have the slightest effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought it would.

Mr. SMOOT. I will suggest to the Senator that if the President of the United States desired that forest reserve to be eliminated and thrown back into the public domain, he could do so to-morrow without any action on the part of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I understand that fully; and I believe that if we adopt this amendment, whereby we refuse to make the appropriation, the President of the United States will take it as an indication of the will of the Congress that this given area should be put back subject to homestead preemption, and that he will obey the will of Congress in that respect thus indicated.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator and his friends would go to the President and ask him to annul this reservation, very likely he would do it; but the fact of not appropriating for it has no such effect. If we are going to begin a system of liberating these reserves in whole, let us do it in the regular way by law. Let us not undertake to debauch our appropriation bills in this way to reach it indirectly. Let us not bring about the scandals we have had already out of remote sections as to forestry, and so forth. We have had rattled around this Chamber the names of Weyerhaeuser and Guggenheim and others because of alleged scandalous proceedings in land. If you deny this proposed appropriation and undertake to open up 11,000,000 acres of land and throw it out to the despoilers to exploit it in any way they choose, thousands of millions of dollars' worth of it, you will not even have a forestry man there to say them nay or report to you what they do.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator is going too far.

Mr. WARREN. I am going just as far as others have gone before me, and no further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it is to be exploited in any way at all, it would be exploited by homestead claim.

Mr. WARREN. Possibly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not really exploiting public lands at all. That is exploiting them only in a way that is consonant with a confirmed policy of the United States—these United States, not this United States.

Mr. WARREN. All of the argument of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has been directed to the general system of conservation, and of course to all of the forest reserves. I am not willing to take it up in an appropriation bill. I am ready to conclude now the few remarks I have made, with the hope that we are about ready to vote, and that we may get out of this prolonged delay in consideration of the Agricultural bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I simply want to answer the Senator from Wyoming. I want to state to him that he is mistaken in saying that I made an argument against conservation. I do not like to have the statement rest in that way. I think the statements I have made show the contrary.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to withdraw any remark that the Senator does not like and let it rest on what he said.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that; but I simply wanted to contradict the Senator's conclusion.

As I stated in my opening remarks, I am very much in favor of the conservation of forests and the conservation of other natural resources. It is simply a question whether there is a natural resource to be conserved and whether or not the reasons for conservation exist in each particular case.

The Senator from Wyoming is trying to apply the reasoning used with regard to this particular forest reserve to all forest reserves throughout the United States, and I will not personally be a party to any such agreement. He says that the same conditions that apply to this reserve apply to other reserves throughout the United States. I differ with him in regard to some of them.

I know magnificent forests in the Cascade Mountains that are in forest reserves, and that should be there. I know great forests in the Sierra Nevada Range that are in forest reserves, and should be there. I know that they conserve a good public purpose. There may be some particular forest reserves in the West that never should have been created. That is a question of evidence in the particular case. I am not prepared to discuss that question. I am simply stating that the evidence discloses the fact that the continuation of the Chugach Forest Reserve does not conserve any good purpose. That is what I am arguing now.

I wish to say to the Senator that when he states that we are throwing this land back into the public domain to become ground for more scandals, such as have occurred throughout that country, he is evidently making a thoughtless statement, or a statement without knowledge of the existing laws governing Alaska. If that land is thrown back into the national domain, it is subject to the laws covering the public domain in Alaska, and under the law covering the public domain in Alaska no timber can be acquired except by purchase from the Department of the Interior, at the discretion of the Department of the Interior, solely for domestic use or local use in Alaska, and not for export. That is where it would lodge. As to the homestead law, it would only be subjected to such laws as may be made for homesteads in Alaska. There is no chance of gobbling up any public domain that we do not want gobbled up under the homestead law of Alaska. Those are things that the Senator must know.

The Senator says that if we pass this bill we will not accomplish anything by it. I want to state——

Mr. WARREN. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. I stated that by adopting this proposed amendment you absolutely tie it up. It is a reservation now, with somebody there to take your applications; and the Senator proposes to tie it up and leave it without anybody there to do that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, if we adopt this amendment, we find ourselves in this position: We find that we have saved the Government $16,500. We find that the supervisor who grants the permits for settlement in the Chugach Forest Reserve is still at Ketchikan, where he always was. It simply means that anyone who desires to get a permit will have to go to Ketchikan instead of to Valdez. That is the only difference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Where will he have to go if we abolish the forest reserve?

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is complaining that under the present law he will have to go to Ketchikan to get a permit of entry. Where would he have to go if we abolished the forest reserve if he wanted to enter this land?

Mr. PITTMAN. I regret that I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will just state the point that I desired to make by the question which I asked the Senator; and that is that whether you abolished the forest reserve or kept it, the same difficulties about which the Senator is complaining would exist. He would still have to go a long way to a public-land office in order to make an entry.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not entirely, I will say to the Senator, for this reason: Under the public-land laws you can acquire a possessory right on public domain by settlement with an intention of initiating a homestead. On a forest reserve you do not acquire any possessory right, but you become a trespasser, and it does not inure to your benefit. That is the distinction. In one case you become a squatter, and in the other case you become a trespasser.

As far as getting a permit is concerned, if this appropriation is not made and the reserve is continued, you get your permit from the same supervisor at Ketchikan, because this appropriation is not for the support of the supervisor at Ketchikan; and even if this forest reserve should not be ultimately abolished, you would be in just as good a position as you are now, and you would save $16,500.

I wish to say to the Senator that if we should go to the President of the United States to-morrow and ask him to use his power by proclamation to abolish this reserve, he would not do it unless all of the facts that are being presented here were presented to him there, and I am satisfied that he has not the time to hear those facts presented to him. Although I know he has the power by Executive order to restore that forest reserve to the public domain, he would rather be advised by the Congress of the United States as to his course. The Senate and the House of Representatives are having presented to them now the facts which justify either the abolition or the continuance of that reserve. The vote of the Senate on this amendment will bespeak the sentiment of the Senate on that question.

Mr. WARREN. I do not propose that the Senator shall take me into that list, and I do not believe he ought to take others into it, because, if the Senator will excuse me——

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. It is not a proper statement to make simply because a Senator will not debauch an appropriation bill by loading every kind of a thing on it and working against law, instead of with it. It is our duty to appropriate money under the law, and if laws are later passed which render this appropriation unnecessary and it is not needed it will not be expended. I might with perfect consistency support the bill which the Senator has reported from his committee when I could not consistently or with any reason support this amendment. There are other Senators the same way, and the Senator must not draw that distinction.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not believe that view is generally taken, although it may be. Of course, if a Senator feels any hesitation in voting on this question by virtue of any amendment to an appropriation bill, it would not in any way reflect his sentiment on the main question, but personally I can not conceive of the distinction in this particular case. Here is an appropriation of $16,330 for the employment of men, principally rangers, and the support of those rangers in a forest reserve, which the evidence discloses serves no good public purpose and, on the contrary, is an obstruction to the policy we are now pursuing in Alaska.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Development.

Mr. PITTMAN. When that appears from the evidence, and that is what I am contending, I think the time to act is when this appropriation is up. I do not believe it is the duty of a Senator to vote for an appropriation that he does not approve of because at some subsequent time he can destroy the work for which the appropriation is made. The Senator from Wyoming believes in destroying the Chugach Forest Reserve. According to his own statement, he agreed with me on the bill. The forest reserve is not only useless but is an obstruction.

Mr. WARREN. I will have to ask the Senator to change that a little. I believe that all reserve in forests where there are no forests should be excluded, but no man is any stronger for conservation than I where there are really useful growing forests. I have heard the same story about the forests of Colorado, Wyoming, and other places, that there was nothing in them but a few whipstocks of aspen and in some places scrub pine; that they were worthless, and so forth; but I am satisfied that in portions of Alaska, from information which I have, that, just like a portion of Wyoming and other States, there is very valuable timber. We had the argument here when you wanted to build a railroad that you wanted to go in and develop the lumber with other interests.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator, however, has stated, and I am satisfied his mind is made up on that subject, that when the bill for the abolition of the forest reserve comes before the Senate he will vote for it. I can not imagine that he would vote for it if it conserved any good public purpose, and yet he is willing to vote an appropriation to maintain something that does not conserve a good public purpose and to take the chances of the future for its being destroyed. That is inconceivable to me.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to make a short statement in relation to the country where this reserve is located. I happened at one time to walk through a portion of it in the winter and I know something about it from personal experience. The portion of Alaska that is contained in this reservation is a very rough country.

I do not understand the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] when he states that there is a great demand for this land for agricultural purposes. It contains a larger number of most interesting glaciers than any other portion of Alaska, and is a very rough country, with very little possibility for agricultural development, unless it may be in some portion of it near Cook Inlet. That portion of it which lies near Prince William Sound and the major portion to the east of this reserve is not agricultural land. It is even marked on the map here, the Government map, as being a rugged, snow-clad, mountainous country five to eight thousand feet high within a few miles of the coast line.

About Cook Inlet, I think, the character of the country is better, but the agricultural land of which we were speaking when we were trying to get the appropriation for the Alaskan railway is the country lying to the north. Over this first coastal range of mountains there is a country which has level land upon it, and in the country still farther north, over the next range, there can be raised large quantities of good vegetables. This land is rich enough where you can find valleys, but it is cut into deep ravines. It pains me to disagree with the Senator by saying that it contains a great deal of fine timber, if I am any judge of it, along the coast line. It contains some of the best timber in Alaska. The same condition, of course, prevails on down the coast. There is some very fine cedar there, or near there. There is some very fine spruce. There is a very fine quality of white birch, and there is some fir.

The Indians who live along that coast, as will be certified to by my friend the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who has also been in that country, make large canoes of a single log of cedar, which will hold some 40 to 80 siwashes, in which they go out to sea. The fine lines of those canoes were adopted by the whites for the fastest vessels in the world at one time. They built the finest canoes to be found anywhere, and burned and steamed them from a single stick of the cedar timber that grows along that coast. Of course, farther up the coast there is not such good timber. It is testified to, I think, by the department itself that to the west of this reserve there have been forest fires. I have traveled day after day through burns where the timber had been burned on it. It was a smaller and poorer quality of timber than this on the coast.

I should like to see this timber thrown open for the use of people who will go in there to develop that country, with proper safeguards thrown around it so that it would not be picked up by such fellows as the German, whose name I do not now recall.

Mr. WARREN. Weyerhaeuser.

Mr. LANE. Weyerhaeuser, who bought all the timber in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, and other States. I am suspicious that that is about what will happen if we throw this reserve open without proper protection. The people who go up in Alaska have a saying among themselves that they do not go there for their health.

Mr. PITTMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Could the Senator suggest some provision to prevent that timber from being taken up?

Mr. LANE. I will try in a few minutes.

Mr. PITTMAN. I suppose the Senator knows that there is a law now on the statute books to the effect that no timber on the public domain of Alaska can be located.

Mr. LANE. I did not know that that was the law. They cut off a great deal of it in Alaska.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the law now.

Mr. LANE. How long has it been the law?

Mr. PITTMAN. For about 10 years.

Mr. LANE. I have seen them cut large quantities of it.

Mr. PITTMAN. No timberland on the public domain of Alaska is subject to acquisition.

Mr. LANE. They acquire it; I have seen them do it, and they can get lots of it. I have seen sawmills running full head of steam 24 hours out of 24 hours cutting it and selling it for a hundred dollars a thousand feet for rough lumber. Up in the country north of it they cut spruce by the millions on millions of feet, and they build houses and everything else with it.

Mr. PITTMAN. On the Chugach Forest Reserve?

Mr. LANE. Yes, sir. I have been through the Chugach, and I was going to call——

Mr. PITTMAN. The Forestry Department fails to say that there is very much timber cut on that reserve. I presume their records are incorrect.

Mr. LANE. They have cut it, and they have built log houses all through there. I have seen them. They built a city at Valdez. I was not talking particularly about this reserve, for that is a rough country, and there are not a great many people who live on this reservation outside of the towns located on tidewater.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is speaking about timber in the Chugach Forest Reserve?

Mr. LANE. No, sir; I was talking about the Tanana, Government land, spruce timber. It is not of such good quality as there is in the Chugach Reserve. I do not think that land in this reserve will develop into an agricultural country. It is too rough. Mines will be opened there—low-grade copper ore. There is no gold mined that I know of in that district. There are mines north of there. Most of the mines are on the Kuskokwim or over toward the Tanana and up the Susitna and those rivers outside of this reserve.

Just what the object of opening this timber is now I do not know. The time is coming with the opening of the railroad to open up that country. This timber will be needed for legitimate use in the development of the country, and I should like to see it get into the hands of those people who will use it for that purpose. If it can be safeguarded in that way, I would be glad to have it thrown open and take it out of the reserve. If this is to be thrown open to be grabbed up by a lot of sharpers who have marked it down as they have pretty nearly all the resources of that country, I am opposed to it. They have been busy for two or three years getting ready for this railway in order, by some hocus-pocus, to get possession of them and hold up the people who come in there to develop the country. I would not like to see that happen. I have wondered at it——

Mr. WILLIAMS. No one can get over 160 acres without violating the law.

Mr. LANE. They never could without violating the law, but some way or other they always did. That was the law, but by subornation of perjury they hired roustabouts off the wharves and from the dives and had them go out and perjure themselves, and they bought up mile after mile.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator think that time has passed?

Mr. LANE. I do not know whether it has or not. I hope so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Speaking for myself, I do not believe any man will take that risk again under the Government as it is at present administered.

Mr. LANE. I do not know; I was acquainted with more than one fellow who acquired a large fortune that way; they became rich and never suffered any penalty. In fact, they became quite smug and respectable citizens afterwards and had a voice in legislation in our State and also in national legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will ask the Senator from Oregon if he would not just as leave have that timber under the absolute control of the Secretary of the Interior as under the control of the Forestry Department?

Mr. LANE. I do not care who controls it as long as it is protected.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then if you abolish this reserve under the existing laws covering the public domain it will be under the absolute discretionary control of the Secretary of the Interior, who, I think, would be just as careful of its conservation as the Forestry Department.

Mr. LANE. The point which I wish to make is this: I think the Senator from Nevada is mistaken if he thinks that throwing this open is going to benefit the farmer. There will not be many farmers there. They will go north of it. There may be a few, but they will be very few. There will be some mines, and the miners should be allowed to use it. There is good timber in there, I think, and it is valuable. It is going to be worth money, but it will never be shipped out of there. It will not be exported for the reason that it would go down the coast, and going down the coast for a thousand miles it would pass equally good and even better timber. It would be like carrying coals to Newcastle. You would not have a market for it outside. You could not sell it to the Puget Sound people or the people in Oregon, because they have plenty of timber of their own. Naturally the people will use it right there. The hardwood they will have to import; there is no doubt about that. I should like to see this guarded if it could be done. I would not like to make the prophecy, but I would be willing to make a small bet that if you throw this open to the public at this time some very enterprising gentlemen will grab up the principal portion of it. I have been in that country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not that assertion assume that the Interior Department is not going to attend to its duties?

Mr. LANE. The Interior Department or anyone else may or may not attend to their duties. We have had an Interior Department ever since about 1850, and they have been in charge of the affairs of all our reserves, both the white man's and the Indian's. The Indians have gone broke on it and our resources have mostly gone into the hands of private persons.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand, if the Senator from Oregon will pardon me, that a different creed has come into existence in the last 10 or 15 years, and that men who were formerly treated with leniency in the violation of the land laws will be treated hereafter and are now treated with stringency. I do not believe that the Interior Department as at present constituted will permit open and flagrant violation of the public-land laws of the United States. Of course I know, as the Senator does, that it has happened in the past; but the Senator must be aware, as I am, of the reawakening of the public conscience in the United States in connection with the resources of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. LANE. If I may make an answer to this, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I perhaps would not have paid so much attention to it were it not for the fact that I received a letter a short time ago from an old friend of mine in Alaska, familiar with that country, who had been all through this country, and who wrote down to me and said, "The bunch are getting ready to grab up all the resources of Alaska as soon as you pass the railway bill. Put the Secretary of the Interior onto it and get him posted. They are getting busy."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator think that Franklin K. Lane is getting ready to keep them from doing it?

Mr. LANE. I do not know. I sent the letter to him. He said the matter belonged to some other department, the War Department, I think, when he returned it to me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only desire to say a very few words with reference to the objections which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has made to the Forestry Service controlling this reserve.

It seems to me that the arguments which he makes could be urged against almost any of our land laws, and if we were to abolish the forest-reserve system because of the faults of administration which the Senator from Nevada pointed out it could be urged with equal force that we ought to abolish the homestead law because of certain faults in administration.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in a moment, if the Senator please. I decline to yield just now.

I agree with the criticism made by the Senator from Nevada and many others, both on this occasion and many other occasions, as to what is called bureaucracy in government, but I am not in favor of abolishing the Government because there are faults in bureaus.

It seems to be the logic of his proposition that because there are faults in administration of the forest-reserve law we are to abolish the forest-reserve system. They have a very bad, an intolerable, practice in the General Land Office, at least in some of the Western States, in the administration of the homestead law. I only mention it to illustrate the nature of the objections here to this forestry law. That practice is to file what might be called a blanket protest against the final proof of homesteaders. It is obnoxious. They have agents in the field who are drawing a salary, and I suppose in many instances make these protests in order to make a showing of doing something to justify their retention in office. They file a protest against a man's homestead proof without knowing anything whatever about his proof. The poor homesteader is scared to death. The land agent goes on his easy way; he does not bother himself about investigating the matter. It may be six months or it may be a year before he ever goes on the homestead or makes any inquiry to ascertain whether or not the homesteader has really complied with the law. Finally, after the lapse of a long time, he comes in and waives his protest. That is a bad practice; but nobody has proposed that we should abolish the homestead law because of that abuse. Rather, we are in favor of removing the abuse and perfecting the administration of the homestead law. That would be the logical and businesslike way to proceed against the existence of any abuses as to forest reserves.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. I asked the Senator from Nevada a while ago to state some specific instance of hardship and oppression which he said had resulted in this Chugach reserve from its being a reserve. What I meant by that was that he should point out some individual cases where men, for instance, have made application for homestead and had had difficulty; but, instead, while he said that he would proceed to give some specific instances, he then proceeded to read from the hearings before the Committee on Territories along general discussion of the abuses of the forest-reserve system and a cross-examination of Chief Forester Graves. There were not any specific cases included in that, of course. There was one specific instance which the Senator from Nevada mentioned, I think, on yesterday, and I listened to it with a great deal of interest, and to the graphic description which he gave of the hardships of a poor homesteader in the Kuskokwim who had been oppressed by the existence of the Chugach Forest Reserve. The Senator told about the long journey of this poor man, whose rights had been interfered with by the establishment of this reserve, in order to find a forest agent so as to make his application for a homestead. That would be very cogent if we did not know that the Chugach Forest Reserve is at least 150 miles from the Kuskokwim and is separated by the Mount McKinley range, so that it could not possibly have had any effect upon the difficulties which this homesteader, to whom the Senator referred yesterday, had in making his entry.

What is the criticism of the Chugach Forest Reserve? It is said that there is but a small amount of timber per acre there, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] asked on yesterday what was the average altitude of the land. Well, what is desired to be proved by that? There might be a peak of barren granite and snow 12,000 feet high, which did not have a stick of timber on its sides above 2,000 feet altitude. That would increase the average altitude of this forest reserve, but what has that got to do with the proposition? That would not affect in any way the merits of the Forest Service upon the lowlands along the sea where these forests actually exist; and the main resources which seem to be in view to be reached by some one by the abolishment of this forest reserve are the barren lands where there are no forests. Those are the Chugach range of mountains; they are the great Alaskan Alpine range of granite and black shale and glaciers and snows; and people imagine that there are precious mines in them, and there are minerals in some of them.

I do not suppose there is a Senator in this body who would oppose the Senator from Nevada if he came here with a proposition to eliminate those mineral lands where there are no forests from this reservation. It may be of interest to the Senator from Nevada to know that this administration, with which he is identified, and to whose party he belongs, has already taken steps to do that very thing, and that in the middle of this month the Secretary of Agriculture, in whose department the forest reserves are, filed a written recommendation that four and a half million acres out of this 11,000,000 acres, which the Senator from Nevada speaks of, be eliminated. That will remove the objection which the Senator, at least, has to that part of the reserve.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment. The Senator speaks of this great area of 11,000,000 acres with a scope of gesture and a comprehensiveness of language that would create the impression that it covered all that part of the world. As a matter of fact, it is a mere dot in the 364,000,000 acres that compose Alaska.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], my friend for whose opinions I have great respect, standing by me, asks why should not this timber go to the people. I am glad that he has asked me that question, for that is a part of the argument which has been made. I am very glad to say that it does go to the people; and I know that the Senator from Mississippi, with the sincerity with which he acts upon these questions, will be glad to know that this question which we are discussing, which has been presented here by the proponents of this amendment on the basis of allowing the homesteaders and the miners to get timber—that under the law as it now exists they get timber, and they do not have to go through any formal process whatever in order to get it; they do not have to ask any formal permit; all they have to do, if they want timber for their own use in mining and in homesteading, is to go and take the timber. They are allowed to do it under the law, and they are allowed to do it in the administration of the law.

Mr. PITTMAN. How can they do it in homesteading when they can not homestead?

Mr. POINDEXTER. What we were discussing was homesteads, and the Senator from Nevada now assumes that there are no homesteads. In response to that, I will say that there are homesteads, and that, according to the testimony of the Director of the Forestry Service, upon whose testimony the Senator from Nevada has based his main argument, not a single application for a homestead in this reservation during the last year was denied; every one of them was granted.

Mr. PITTMAN. Were any of them granted during last year?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. How many?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not prepared to say how many.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no record of that in the testimony.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But I have here on page 446 in the testimony of the witness from whom the Senator from Nevada has read at such great length, this statement:

> Mr. WICKERSHAM. Upon what grounds do you refuse a homestead entry on these lands?
> Mr. GRAVES. We have applications for homesteads sometimes on heavily timbered areas.
> Mr. WICKERSHAM. I mean in the Chugach Forest.
> Mr. GRAVES. I know. The last year there were not any rejections, so I do not know that we had grounds for refusal.

That is the testimony to which I refer.

Mr. PITTMAN. But he does not testify that there were any granted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, Mr. President, if there were no applications, there would not be any entries; but that is on a line with the argument which the Senator himself has made, that this forest ought to be thrown open, so that people can use it, following that up by the statement that it was useless to keep it there, because there was just as much of it used now as there would be if it were thrown open.

The Senator said in his argument that every application for timber had been granted. The same thing applies to homesteads; every application for a homestead has been granted; every application for a mineral claim where there was any mineral has been granted. There is no record of any rejection of any application for a mineral claim.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator will look on page 446, from which he is reading, he will see a record of denial and of rejection, which he did not read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to read, in view of the emphasis which the Senator from Nevada has placed upon the statements of Mr. Graves, the Chief Forester, a statement which I just have from Mr. Graves himself, which is somewhat in conflict with the deductions which the Senator from Nevada has made from his testimony before the Committee on Territories. It throws some light upon his views as to the importance of this reserve and the purposes for which it was created.

The Senator from Nevada has asked a great many times why is a forest reserve maintained there, and he has stated that nobody could give any good reason for its being there. I can give the same reasons for having a reserve there that can be given for having forest reserves anywhere else. The very argument the Senator makes that timber is scarce in that country, that there are great areas of untimbered lands, make it more important that such timber as there is should be conserved. The purpose of having a forest reserve and having it administered according to forestry principles is to make it a perpetual resource, instead of allowing it to be used immediately and destroyed. Conserving the timber means so cutting the timber and so using it that the forest will be continually renewing itself, and that the same amount can be cut from year to year indefinitely. That is the purpose of having a forest reserve there; but if you turn it over to the horde of speculators and exploiters who will follow the line of the new railroad into Alaska, you will find it swept of its resources and as barren as the battle field of the Wilderness was after the war had laid its desolating touch upon it.

Mr. PITTMAN. What would the people do with it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. You will find it just as barren as the timberlands of Minnesota and Michigan, which the great lumber barons have stripped of their resources in order to acquire sudden wealth, without any regard to the future.

The Senator says we want to care for the present generation. We want to care for the present generation and allow them to use this timber, and we can do that by a proper system of forestry, and at the same time keep the forests so that future generations can use them. Mr. Graves says:

> There are two national forests in Alaska—the Tongass, situated in the Panhandle and extending south from Skagway, and the Chugach, surrounding Prince William Sound and extending from Cook Inlet on the west to a short distance beyond Bering River on the east. The net area of the Tongass National Forest is nearly 15,500,000 acres, and that of the Chugach slightly in excess of 11,000,000 acres.
> The forests were created under the act of Congress which specifies that "no public forest reservation shall be established except to improve and protect the forest within the reservation, or for the purpose of securing favorable conditions of water flows, and to furnish a continuous supply of timber for the use and necessities of the citizens of the United States."
> It was necessary to retain in the United States the title to these valuable timberlands. Continuous timber production on privately owned lands is out of the question.

I think that is a most significant statement, and it is corroborated by the observation of everybody who has given attention to it:

> Continuous timber production on privately owned lands is out of the question.

And I will interpolate here that that is another way of expressing the object of having a forest reserve—to provide for continuous timber production.

> It was believed that the fullest development in the future of all local industries and lasting prosperity in Alaska depend upon a permanent future timber supply. This is possible only with the protection of the forest from fire where there is fire danger and reasonably close utilization of the existing supply under conservative forest management. Furthermore, the greatest possible surplus production over local needs will fall far short of the future demand from this source for lumber and pulp in the United States.
> The best available estimates show, and these estimates are intended to be conservative, that the total stand of timber in the Tongass National Forest, with its 12,000 miles of forested shore line, reaches a total of 70,000,000,000 feet b. m., while that on the Chugach, situated much farther to the north and under more adverse climatic conditions, totals approximately 8,000,000,000 feet. For these forests together I have limited the annual cut to the enormous amount of nearly 800,000,000 feet, and this figure represents the amount of timber which can be cut from these forests for all time under conservative management.

And yet they say that these forests are not worth the snap of your finger. It reminds me of the propaganda of depreciation of the coal lands of Alaska about the time we had the Ballinger case pending, when the more eager they were to obtain them the fiercer was the argument that they were worthless.

> The boundary lines of these forests, and particularly of the Chugach, were broadly drawn—

I desire to call the Senator's particular attention to this—and for descriptive purposes, and in order to avoid the necessity for extensive surveys, the Chugach was made to include large areas of treeless but comparatively inaccessible lands. Subsequent and more detailed examinations of the Chugach boundaries show the possibility of extensive eliminations. I am prepared, therefore, to recommend to the President the elimination of approximately 5,000,000 acres from the Chugach National Forest, reducing its limits very nearly to the forest-bearing area.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I merely want to interpolate a suggestion there. The Senator called my attention to a matter which I was unable to answer without disturbing him, which I did not desire to do; but with regard to the elimination by the Forestry Bureau of a portion of the Chugach Forest, it does not in any way change the facts before the Senate, for the reason that the Forester testified, as the Senator will recollect, that of the 11,000,000 acres in that reserve there were only 4,000,000 that had timber on them, and on those 4,000,000 acres of timber there were 8,000,000,000 feet. Now, on the land that is still retained there are only 8,000,000,000 feet, and of that there is not over a third that is mature timber; consequently there is on the land retained in the reserve less than a thousand board feet to the acre.

Now, let me correct one other statement while I am on my feet. The Senator says that on yesterday I said "Kuskokwim River" in referring to the difficulties of a homesteader in the Chugach Reserve. It is possible I said the Kuskokwim River, but I did not mean the Kuskokwim River, because I am perfectly familiar with that map. I meant Resurrection Bay.

Just at this point, so as not to interrupt the Senator any further, let me read a few brief remarks——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think I will have to decline to yield to the Senator to read from the hearings. I will yield the floor in a moment. I want to say in regard to the Senator's remark that the fact that the Forestry Bureau is about to eliminate one-half of the area of the Chugach Forest Reserve, which does not contain timber, does not, as he says, change the question in any way, that it seems to me to weaken the force of his argument about 50 per cent, because he was arguing that there was a certain amount of timber per acre on 11,000,000 acres. Reading further from this statement, Mr. Graves says:

The area to be eliminated is situated along practically the entire northern boundary of the forest, and includes a large portion of the treeless area of the Kenai Peninsula.

The national forests have not in the slightest degree interfered with mining or any other legitimate development in Alaska.

I think this is entitled to weight, because the Senator from Nevada has relied upon the statements of this same man for the support of his amendment.

In fact—

He says—

it is common knowledge that within the areas embraced within these forests in southern and southeastern Alaska the permanent mining and other development has been far greater during the latter part of the last decade than in any other section.

The Alaskan forests are not a drain upon the resources of the United States, as is sometimes believed. For these forests the surplus of receipts over expenditures during the last fiscal year was more than $12,000, and during the preceding year more than $10,000. Furthermore, this surplus occurs at a time when only a very small part of the resources of the forests are being used. Sales of timber to the present time are supplying only a comparatively small local demand. This demand in both forests will certainly increase in the future, but there will continue to be a large surplus for use as pulp and lumber in the United States over local needs which may be removed under conservative management.

Tentative applications have already been received in both forests for large sales of pulp material, and the consummation of these sales is dependent only upon the ability of the applicants to secure proper financial backing. Capital should certainly be available for development when it is known that the great bulk of the material suitable for pulp is situated within a very short distance of tidewater, making possible the transportation of the manufactured product in seagoing ships from the place of manufacture; and, furthermore, that water power far in excess of any possible needs can be developed at almost any situation suitable for the erection of pulp and paper mills.

The plan to abolish the national forests in Alaska is a destructive one. It would result in the passing of title to timber lands of great value into private hands, speculative increases in stumpage and lumber values, and greatly increased costs to the ultimate consumer, to say nothing of the difficulties which would be placed in the way of development. All protection would be withdrawn and wasteful methods of utilization would be the rule. But, most serious of all, there would be no provision for the continuous production of the large amounts of timber which will in the future be essential for the welfare of Alaska and the United States. Such a policy, furthermore, would be absolutely inconsistent with the splendid plan which is now being advocated of large expenditures by the Federal Government for the construction of railroads and other methods of transportation needed for the development of the resources of Alaska.

I only wish to add that the maintenance of this forest reserve is in the interest of the small landholder, the poor homesteader, and the small miner, who under the forest-reserve law has free access to this timber without even the difficulty of making an application for a permit. On the other hand, if it is thrown open, although the Senator from Nevada says there is no law under which it could be acquired and exploited, there very soon would be a strong movement for the passage of some law under which it could be acquired by private parties as has been the case in the western part of the State of Washington and the State of Idaho, where most of the timber is held by a very few private parties; and then the small miner and the homesteader would not be able to acquire from these great private landholders the timber needed for his entry which he now can acquire free from the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHIVELY. I hope the Senator will not do that. I wish to submit several conference reports.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Indiana has any objection to the motion, of course I will withdraw it.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 371) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to have printed for their use 1,000 copies, or as many thereof as they may deem necessary, of the hearings held by a subcommittee of that committee under Senate joint resolution 88 and Senate joint resolution 50.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Out of what fund is that payable?

Mr. OVERMAN. Out of the contingent fund, I suppose. Under the general authority that the committee has to pay for printing, it will be paid out of the contingent fund. I suppose that is the only way it can be paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it payable out of a general appropriation or out of the contingent fund?

Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose the only way to pay it is out of the contingent fund.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then it ought to be sent to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand it is paid out of the printing fund.

Mr. SMOOT. It is charged up to the printing of the Senate. Therefore the resolution will not have to go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to determine the fact. If it is to be paid out of the contingent fund, it must be sent to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If not, it need not be.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, it is not.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is the exception. It is not payable from the contingent fund.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 4096. An act to amend the act authorizing the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes;

S. 4632. An act for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold, Cheyenne River, Standing Rock, Rosebud, and Pine Ridge Indian Reservations, in the States of North and South Dakota;

S. 5289. An act to provide for warning signals on vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work, and to amend section 2 of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States";

H. R. 12806. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside; and

H. R. 16508. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the debate upon the pending amendment, and will yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the amendment presented by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his address on his amendment. He presented to the Senate a strong array of facts. I am not certain whether or not he made out a prima facie case. I may say, however, that this is not the proper way nor is this the proper time to abandon or abolish the forest reservation in question.

If the Senator's bill should pass the Congress and become a law, the present appropriation would lapse. It does not become operative until the first of the fiscal year. If, on the other hand, the Senator's bill should fail to pass and the Congress should fail to make this appropriation, the situation of the home seeker in Alaska would be even worse, if possible, than it is at present. There would be no one in charge of the reserve. It would be liable to forest fires or other ravages, and, it seems to me, it would be extremely unwise to set a precedent of this character.

I may say to the Senator that while I favor conservation I favor a conservation which not only permits but promotes development. I do not favor a conservation which is synonymous with paralysis or with stagnation.

I am extremely anxious to take the sense of the Senate upon this amendment. There are Senators present to-day who will be absent to-morrow and who are anxious to register their views upon the pending amendment.

I therefore move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 23, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 22, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Great God, our Father, so strong, so pure, so generous, altogether self-sustaining, without whom we are nothing, continue Thy blessings and make us the instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of Thy plans, that Thy will may be done in us, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15613 and other bills, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15613, and to consider other bills embraced in the special order, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill under consideration by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the several departments and bureaus of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the commission, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any corporation subject to any of the provisions of this act, and shall detail from time to time such officials and employees to the commission as he may direct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to this section to furnish information to the commission which provides that any of the departments or bureaus of the Government when directed by the President shall furnish to the commission upon its request all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any corporation. Take the income-tax returns, which the law provides shall not be furnished. Now, this of course is a subsequent act. Will all of that information be furnished to this commission upon request?

Mr. COVINGTON. Not necessarily.

Mr. MANN. Under this it possibly might be.

Mr. COVINGTON. Not necessarily.

Mr. MANN. Well, "not necessarily," that is the question. Is not it necessarily furnished if the President so directs?

Mr. COVINGTON. I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. The income-tax returns are in the possession of a bureau of the Government, are they not?

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And that is information relating to a corporation, if it is a corporation. That is perfectly clear. Now, here is a provision of the bill that requires that bureau to furnish any information in its possession to the trade commission if the President directs. I had supposed, under the law, that it was intended to provide that the income-tax returns should not be furnished some other branch of the Government for its use perhaps against the corporation.

Mr. COVINGTON. I think that is quite true. Those returns ought not to be furnished except, perhaps, in an extremely urgent case. The first draft of this section, as prepared by the committee, did not have in it the qualifying clause "when directed by the President." In the first draft of the section the provision as inserted was the same as the provision for the same purpose contained in the law creating the so-called Hadley Commission. That contained one of the broadest powers that has ever been conferred upon a commission to obtain from any of the bureaus or departments of the Government any information which it desired.

Mr. MANN. That is very true, but that was before the income-tax law was in effect.

Mr. COVINGTON. If the gentleman will hear me through. We then determined, however, that by limiting the authority to turn over such information by direction of the President, all the safeguards that ought to surround any class of information would be in the possession of the Government. And the gentleman has apparently overlooked the fact that the new income-tax law itself expressly provides that all returns thereunder shall be open to inspection under the direction of the President.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Was not this matter presented to the committee as follows: When the corporation tax was first created by the act of 1910 there was a provision providing for some sort of general publicity to which there was very great objection by the business interests of the country, and at their suggestion an amendment was subsequently placed, I think, in some appropriation bill, which was substantially in the form in which section 7 appears, that some facts could be furnished to the public upon the order of the President. This has been very satisfactory, and the committee considered it a proper basis for the publicity of these same and similar facts covered by this section.

Mr. COVINGTON. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And that was done at the request of the larger corporations that were interested.

Mr. COVINGTON. That is correct, and that was the guide.

Mr. MANN. Take another branch, take the census returns. We obtain certain information in selecting census statistics which probably we could not obtain under any other provision of the Constitution, with the understanding and statement that those returns would not be made public in the individual cases, but shall only be used in compilation. Under this the President might direct all this information to be turned over to the interstate trade commission and made public.

Mr. COVINGTON. I do not think that necessarily could be called an injury to business.

Mr. MANN. It necessarily follows it can be done under this provision of law.

Mr. COVINGTON. It necessarily follows that it might be possible for the President——

Mr. MANN. Possible and may are the same thing.

Mr. COVINGTON. The gentleman is linking together two improbable situations. The first is that the President would make a demand for a class of information that would not be useful, but would simply tend to harass, and in the thereafter that the commission, having obtained that information, would needlessly and to the harassment of business give it to the public. I do not think any President or any commission of any political party would combine to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to deny the gentleman, but I have not consented for anybody to extend his time, and I will ask him to move to strike out the last word and go on.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will be very frank to say if we can not consider the bill I will insist upon there being a quorum present at all times.

Mr. COVINGTON. I was going to suggest——

Mr. MANN. It would not be in order for me to move to strike out any word.

Mr. TOWNER. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he only, of course, expected that would apply to yesterday, and certainly not to-day, and certainly not to important amendments such as I hope to present for consideration, and which it would be absolutely impossible to present to the committee in five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not responsible for the rules, and if gentlemen see proper to make a point of order of no quorum I can not help it. It is the duty of Members to be here, anyhow. I do not propose to be deterred in my duties by a point of no quorum. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as quickly as to anybody in the world, but I have never consented to more than five minutes to individual Members under the five-minute rule. I am willing for the gentleman to withdraw the pro forma amendment and enter another.

Mr. MANN. Under the usual custom, I think we ought to have a quorum present. If the bill is to be rammed through, I am willing; but we ought to have a quorum here.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggested the way out, but if the gentleman wants the delay, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] make the point of no quorum?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer another——

Mr. MANN. Under the rules I am not permitted to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken	Fergusson	Lafferty	Rayburn

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 15613 and other bills, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, and that 284 Members answered to their names—a quorum—and he presented a list of the absentees to be entered on the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I have no disposition in the world to prevent free, adequate, and full debate on any proposition that needs elucidation, and if it is stated on what particular section additional debate is required, I have no doubt that we can agree on any proposition for additional time.

Mr. MANN. The statement of the gentleman is satisfactory as to what will be done when we reach those provisions.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course.

Mr. MURDOCK. When we reach section 9——

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course I will make any agreement or any proposition for fair debate which the gentleman thinks deserves further debate, under the five-minute rule. I do not think it is proper, in the management of a long bill, to discriminate between individuals who may ask for extension under the rule. I think my plan will give satisfaction.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 6, beginning with line 20, the language:

And shall detail from time to time such officials and employees to the commission as he may direct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 20, strike out the following language: "And shall detail from time to time such officials and employees to the commission as he may direct."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this provision, which is an incidental provision in the bill, authorizes the President to detail employees to this commission from the various departments and bureaus of the Government. A similar provision is in the law, as I recall, in reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a similar provision is in the law in reference to employees of the White House, and, I think, very properly in that case. But the provision absolutely destroys the power of Congress over appropriations for a particular bureau. Congress is quite capable, in my judgment, of making appropriations for the personal services of the employees in any branch of the public service; but when you put into the law a provision that after you have made an appropriation for this commission the President may at will—and, of course, that means that he will do so at the request of the commission—transfer to this commission from any other bureau or department of the Government employees and officials, you leave no power by Congress over the employees in this interstate trade commission.

It has not been conducive to economy in the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not believe in inserting in any law creating a new branch of the Government the power to transfer from other bureaus to the new bureau such officials and employees from other departments as may be requested, because then we shall have left within our control no power over the amount of money which shall be expended or the number of employees who shall receive compensation.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. I recognize the evil to which the gentleman refers, but could not the Congress in making the annual appropriation limit the number of employees which might be transferred or limit the appropriation for the payment of employees that might be transferred upon the order of the President?

Mr. MANN. Practically it could not; theoretically, of course, it could. If it was a change of law, it would be subject to a point of order. But you can not, after every appropriation for each bureau or department of the Government, insert a provision limiting the number of employees that may be transferred from that bureau or department. Theoretically you can, but practically you can not put that language in 100 or 500 different places in an appropriation bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. What I would like to ask my colleague is this: That in the case of a transfer from one department to another it does not follow that the salary of the person transferred will be increased. Now, what I want to know is from what department would that individual draw his salary?

Mr. MANN. Why, from the department to which he was first assigned, not from this new bureau to which he might be transferred.

Mr. McKENZIE. If that is true——

Mr. MANN. It is true.

Mr. McKENZIE. If that is true, would there be any trouble about this?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. Here you appropriate money for the Department of Agriculture, for example, for certain purposes and certain employees, and under this provision those officials, while they are paid by the Department of Agriculture out of appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, may be transferred to work in this division and no account of it kept, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would that work any hardship on the people?

Mr. MANN. That depends on whether it is extravagant or not. It takes away wholly from Congress the power to regulate the number of employees in any of these bureaus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has admitted that this power now rests with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The fact is that with the proposed interstate trade commission there is vastly more necessity for the exercise of such power, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] has rather accurately measured the true situation. This house knows that there is never an appropriation made for an employee in one of the bureaus of this Government by the Committee on Appropriations unless that bureau satisfies the committee that in the normal performance of the functions of the bureau the employee is needed.

Now, then, if in some special investigation, covering a limited period of time, there is a necessity for the sort of a special expert who is already on the pay roll of the Government to aid an investigation by the Interstate Trade Commission, rather than have that commission go outside and obtain a new bureau employee, the commision ought to have his service. A specialist who is drawing a salary from the Government, and who may have that peculiar knowledge which ought to be at the disposal of the commission, is the proper person to be detailed to render service to the commission wherever it is possible to use him. It is for that reason that we followed the language of the existing act to regulate commerce and give this commission opportunity to have, through the President, such experts available.

Mr. MADDEN and Mr. McKENZIE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] first.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the President is not permitted to detail men as provided by this bill, would it not be necessary, then, for the commission to appoint, as they have the power to do under this bill, employees that they will be unable to get along without? And in that way will it not be economy to the Government to have this provision remain in the bill?

Mr. COVINGTON. That is actually the fact, and it was in order to minimize the number of such employments necessary outside of the existing bureaus of the Government service that that provision was inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. But, first, does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] desire to offer an amendment? It seems the gentleman is not here. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the commission may from time to time make rules and regulations and classifications of corporations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

The commision may from time to time employ such special attorneys and experts as it may find necessary for the conduct of its work or for proper representation of the public interest in investigations made by it; and the expenses of such employment shall be paid out of the appropriation for the commission.

Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas.

The commission may also order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending under this act. Such depositions may be taken before any official authorized to take depositions by the acts to regulate commerce.

Upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the commission, the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person or corporation to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the commission made in pursuance thereof.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TOWNER:

Page 6, line 23, strike out all of lines 23, 24, and 25 and insert the following: "For the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, the commission may from time to time classify the corporations subject to its jurisdiction, and may prescribe a period of time within which any class of such corporations shall adopt, as nearly as may be, a uniform system of accounts and the forms of such accounts. After the expiration of the prescribed period the corporations included in such class shall keep uniform accounts in the manner prescribed by the commission. In case of failure or refusal of any such corporation to keep accounts in the manner prescribed by the commission, such corporation shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure or refusal, which forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States brought in the district where the corporation has its principal office or in any district in which it shall do business. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

"Any person who shall willfully make any false entry in the accounts of any book of accounts or in any record or memorandum kept by a corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify the record of any such account, record, or memorandum, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions pertaining to the corporation's business shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or imprisonment for a term of not less than one nor more five years, or to both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That the commission may, in its discretion, from time to time issue orders specifying such accounting or financial papers, records, or documents of corporations or of any class of corporations as may be destroyed after the expiration of a period of time prescribed in such order."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] be willing to enter into an agreement as to the time for debate on this amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time would the gentleman like?

Mr. MANN. Ten minutes on a side.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Then, say 15 minutes on a side, to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] on this side.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is on section 8; 30 minutes on section 8, 15 minutes to a side.

Mr. TOWNER. Not on the section, but on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. On this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will control 15 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman's proposition refer to the section or to the amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. Make it cover the section and the amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN. Make it on the section.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I should like to have some time.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time does the gentleman from Oklahoma want?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Let it be 20 minutes on a side on the section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; let it be 20 minutes on a side on this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto shall close in 40 minutes—20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia, himself.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, may I offer my amendment and have it considered pending?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will offer the amendment and have it read for information.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma moves to amend section 8, on page 6, by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 8. The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to make and establish rules and regulations not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States to aid in the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act, and may by such rules and regulations prohibit corporations subject to the provisions of section 9 of this act in conducting their business from engaging in any practice or from using any method or system, or from pursuing any policy or from resorting to any device, scheme, or contrivance that constitutes unfair competition or unjust discrimination as between competitors, individuals, or communities."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is merely for the purpose of placing in this bill a provision analogous to that which is contained in the act conferring powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I am aware of the fact that the committee had this proposition before them and considered it, I presume carefully, and rejected it. However, I am of the opinion, upon a careful investigation and reading of the hearings, that this bill is absolutely incomplete and will be almost futile in its results unless this provision or one equivalent to it is incorporated in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, in section 9 the power is given to the commission to require annual reports from the corporations that may be engaged in interstate trade, but there is no method by which there can be any ascertainment of the basis on which these reports are made, unless we shall also incorporate into this bill a section which will require an accounting. For this reason it is one of the elements always necessary in the consideration of questions such as those which this commission will be required to pass upon to ascertain particular facts with regard to the operation of the business of a corporation. For instance, it is necessary to ascertain what are the facts with regard to the cost of operation and with regard to all the costs that are paid for the material that makes up the total product of the trade corporation.

They will make their reports to the commission as required by law, but the basis on which those reports are made can not be ascertained except by an expert inquiry, which will be almost futile unless this accounting also is required. The commission will find an absolute necessity for the requirement of accounting if they are to determine as to the correctness or the truth of the reports that are made. That necessity was experienced by the Interstate Commerce Commission. For years they could make no progress with regard to their work because of the fact that they had not the power to require a system of uniform accounting with regard to the essentials which it was necessary for them to have before they could act. A report is all right, but when it comes to ascertaining the correctness of the report, if the books are kept in such a manner that it is impossible to ascertain how correct they are, then gentlemen will see at once the necessity for the requirement of an accounting. For instance, in those reports that were sent to the Interstate Commerce Commission the railroad companies would report lump sums paid for the supplies, but when you came to look to find out where the records were kept with regard to those supplies they were not to be found or were so concealed by the system of bookkeeping that it was impossible to ascertain the truth regarding them.

Now, in the requirements for an accounting it is unnecessary that the commission should formulate a system of bookkeeping for each one of the classes of these corporations, as seems to have been the idea of some of those who testified before the commission, and as is probably the idea of the committee that reported this bill. It is not necessary that there should be an accounting upon any proposition that the commission do not think absolutely necessary and essential to a fair examination and for the purpose of determining the correctness of the report. But the proposition for reporting will be almost futile with regard to the very things which the corporation will desire to conceal unless you can have the power in the hands of the commission to require an accounting which shall make plain from day to day the various transactions of which they think it will be necessary to know in order to ascertain whether or not a fair business transaction or an unfair one is before them; whether a violation of law is concealed by a system of bookkeeping; whether or not the system of bookkeeping adopted by the particular corporation is devised for the purpose of deceiving both the commission, the public, and the stockholders, and perhaps even the directors.

We know from our experience with regard to these matters that there is an absolute necessity of ascertaining the facts, and if you do not require, in the particular things which the commission may desire to know from day to day, the items and the methods of setting down and of accounting that shall be necessary to ascertain whether or not the law is being violated—if you do not require these things, then the mere formal report at the end of the year will be absolutely useless. It will be necessary for the Government to send armies of experts all over the United States to ascertain whether or not the reports are correct.

Of course it is not expected that all of these books shall be examined. The commission will not go for the purpose of examining books unless they find it necessary; but when they do find that it is necessary, then the essentials that they shall certify, that they shall think necessary for the protection of the public and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the law—these essentials must be fairly kept and an accounting made regarding them, so that the inspection may be accurate and full and the truth be obtained.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is only one-half of a bill without an accounting system. There can be no real benefit from reports to be made unless there shall be a basis on which the reports can be made.

It was said in the hearings before the committee by somebody who testified that this will be a great burden upon the corporations. That was said by the railroad companies when this duty was imposed upon them. Now, however, the railroad companies themselves can see the advantage of a uniform system of accounting upon essentials, upon the things that are absolutely necessary to know. The railroads themselves are benefited by doing it. (Publicity being the essential of the establishment of this trade commission, there can be no real publicity unless you establish a system of accounting. I think the amendment which I have proposed will do that.)

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not think that section 8 is sufficiently strong to permit the commission to make rules and regulations as to the manner in which the accounts shall be kept?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I do not. I have examined section 8 carefully, and it is not within the power of the commission under the language of that section to make rules and regulations for the commission. That is not what is intended. It is only with regard to the classification of corporations for the purpose of carrying out provisions of the act. The rules and regulations which the commission may make are limited to the classification. The gentleman can at once see that that language could not possibly authorize an accounting necessary upon which to report the business. The rules and regulations are only with regard to the classification of corporations and can have no reference whatever to the requirements for reports.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee at first sympathized unanimously with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], after the testimony of Mr. Brandeis, and that there should be contained in the measure some uniform system of accounting. But after we heard the witnesses who knew about the practical affairs in the world of business and how the uniform accounting system would work in everyday affairs, most of the committee became opposed to such a provision as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa.

The reason is this: A uniform system of accounting as to railway companies is a practical sort of direction, for the reason that it regulates one particular line of business of a similar character all over the country. In industrial corporations the situation is entirely different. Each line of business is separate and distinct by itself, and each business represents the individual enterprise and policy of its own management; and all of them in such class could not and should not be compelled to adopt the same line of report, because it detracts from the individual efficiency of the management of the corporation. It does not enable them to do the best they can to fill the particular place in the world for which it is best adapted. For the reason, first, that it has been shown that such a requirement clearly would be misleading because it would not show the actual facts and the real condition of affairs in the various business corporations.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. FALCONER. Why not classify the different kinds of business as you do in the workmen's compensation act?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The amendment provides for that. The classification would not help us, for the reason that each individual business, in order to be effective, must be conducted in a way suitable for that particular situation; the supply of raw material, the market there must be, the class of labor it must have, the conditions as to transportation and handling the product—all of the factors of that sort are so entirely different in the various business concerns that a system which would be suitable for one corporation would not at all fit a corporation in another place.

The result would be that such a system of uniform accounting would not show the facts, but would be misleading, and it would tend to unfortunate inefficiency in the daily work of the business concerns. It would increase the cost of production and diminish the individual initiative in the management of concerns under such a plan. It would be a regulation that would be a serious impediment to business affairs of the country at the present time. This was clearly shown to your committee by the testimony of men of large practical experience and genuine sympathy with the purposes of this bill.

Mr. Brandeis in his testimony showed clearly that if we provided now a uniform system of accounting it could not be made fully effective for nearly 20 years. The result of such a direction would be a wet blanket over the business affairs of this country which would not help anyone for a generation, even on his own theory—the enlightenment of the public as to the business affairs of the corporations doing an interstate business.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that if Congress should leave the entire thing to the discretion of the commission as to what they would require it would not lead to an entire reorganization of a uniform system of bookkeeping—if it would not only apply to such things as the commission thought it should apply to?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; these witnesses showed that the same result and the same facts could be obtained better by a system of annual and special reports; that the same facts and same results could be obtained in a much better way and a much clearer way by a requirement for a plan of reports; and such would show the conditions as they exist in that class of business and would help the commission to properly perform its functions.

Then one other fact appeared which to us was of great consequence. These corporations are chartered by the States. Very many of the States lay down legislative rules as to how the corporations should be conducted, as to the methods, schemes of accounting, and so forth. Mr. Brandeis testified that the State of Massachusetts did, and other States undoubtedly do, provide a requirement which practically means a system of uniform accounting as to such State corporations. If this be so, then this proposition would repeal practically every system of accounting provided by the States. Section 20 of the interstate-commerce law, which is a provision for uniform accounting in interstate commerce, has been held not only constitutional, but to be exclusive and to replace all the State systems. I know the gentleman does not desire that, as he would see that such a plan might be disastrous as to many local concerns. Yet such would be the situation. The Supreme Court has construed the existing law so that no railroad can keep any books or memoranda except what is prescribed by the Federal law. So the States are helpless in interstate transportation and would be worse than helpless under the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will a vote be taken on this amendment before I address the committee on the amendment I have proposed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized now for the purpose of consuming his time, if he so desires.

Mr. MANN. Let us have a vote on the other amendment first.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does any gentleman desire to speak for or against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would consider it just as wise to take a chimney sweep and order him to make a watch, or a painter to make an engine, or a doctor to build a ship, or a preacher to manage a bank, or a sculptor to try a lawsuit, or a sewer builder to navigate the air, or a mere infant to improve on Edison's discoveries in electricity as I would to attempt to establish by law throughout all the systems of business in the United States a uniform system of accounting. [Laughter.] It is not fair to suppose that any commission that would be appointed could have sense enough or wisdom enough to know more than all of the men engaged in all of the lines of industry in the United States know now about how their accounts ought to be kept. It is not fair to suppose that we are going to establish a commission and appoint men to that commission who are all-wise, who are going to learn all about the intricate details of every line of business within 10 minutes after they assume the responsibilities under their appointment. It is not fair to assume that the men who are engaged in the business life of the Nation are all crooks and that they keep their accounts to cover up their iniquities.

It is fair, however, to assume that every man engaged in the business life of the United States is an expert, that he is engaged in the business in which he is engaged because of the knowledge of that business which he possesses, and it is fair to assume that every man in a line of business specializes in the particular line and knows more about it than anybody else would know. It is fair to assume that everybody keeps the accounts of his business because he wants a record of the transaction, and it is fair to assume that the records of the transactions in every line of business must be of a different character, that you can not establish any uniform system of accounting except in one particular line of business. You can establish a uniform system of accounting for banks or for railroads, but you can not establish a uniform system of accounting for erecting buildings, for making the brick that go into the buildings, or digging the foundation in which the material is laid and upon which the building is to be erected. You can not establish a uniform system of accounting for building ships that will conform to the system of accounts that must be kept in the conduct of a bank. You can not establish a uniform system of accounting in the business activities of the United States without throwing every line of business into consternation, and to invade the office privacy of the men who are engaged in the business activities of the United States to the extent of attempting to establish a uniform system of accounting, in my judgment, is not the province of Congress, and Congress ought not to enter upon any such activity.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman contend that men engaged in digging a foundation for a building would be engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. MADDEN. They would be to this extent, that they might be connected with interstate commerce because the material that goes into the foundation might pass from one State to another. Mr. Chairman, we do not deal with a particular transaction, we deal with the whole question. We deal with the volume of business. We deal with the things that enter into interstate commerce. We deal with the question over which we propose to take jurisdiction, and I assume that we do not segregate the particular items that enter into a transaction, but we take the whole transaction as it is completed. And to tell me that you can appoint any commission that will be all-wise and that will be able to assume responsibility for the method of keeping accounts in all lines of technical details of great businesses, complicated by scientific and mechanical art, is to say that the Congresss of the United States has a wisdom beyond that which is possessed by all of the people who send us here.

I believe that no such amendment ought to be placed in the bill. I believe we want to establish confidence in the minds of the business public. We have done so many things to take away the confidence of the people in the wisdom of the Congress that we ought not to add this other complication by requiring them to establish a uniform system of accounting in all of the varied lines of business conducted throughout the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to corroborate the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], that the committee gave very careful consideration to this amendment to classify corporations and impose a uniform system of accounts. I wish to suggest to this committee that this is a very extraordinary venture. It is a subject that may be, and doubtless will be, considered by the commission, which in turn will doubtless report upon its feasibility, its practicability, and its desirability.

As for myself, I look upon the efforts to inject the power of this Nation into the individual business of accounting of the corporations in our several States as one of the most imperialistic steps that could possibly be taken, and you gain nothing by it but confusion worse confounded. You would terrorize the business of the Nation, you would impair initiative in business. Mark you, gentlemen, we should do nothing that would prevent the progress and productivity of business. Production must constantly equal or exceed population, or we will have to introduce the Malthusian doctrine to reduce population or go backward. This whole question of accounting, I submit, is one to be primarily considered by this commission, and upon its recommendations we could determine its expediency and its wisdom; but as it strikes me now, as it struck me at first thought, to take a national institution and project it into the accounting of the business of the various corporations, conflicting, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has suggested, with the regulations of the corporations by State laws, and at one stroke to require a uniform system of accounting where there can be no uniformity; to require a uniformity of accounting when in the nature of things there must be diversity, and to do that in advance of any work by this commission or reports from it, would be, it seems to me, very intemperate and unwise legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time until I hear from the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], and I ask for a vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK) there were—ayes 15, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes are remaining to the credit of the gentleman from Georgia and five minutes to the credit of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, before I begin I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, under section 8, which says that the commission, from time to time, may make rules and regulations and classifications of corporations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act—under that section the commission has very limited power to make rules and regulations, because under the provisions of the act the commission virtually has no power to enforce laws or to regulate the practices of corporations subject to the provisions of the bill. Now, the amendment which I have offered gives to the commission the power to make rules and regulations that would prohibit specifically the particular practices which constitute unfair competition or unfair discrimination. The amendment is drawn on the idea that some place along the line Congress will prohibit in general terms unfair competition and unfair discrimination. Then, of course, unfair competition or unjust discrimination would be unlawful. Then we give the commission power to make rules and regulations that would prohibit a specific practice that constitutes unfair competition. Now, then, gentlemen, we never will control the corporations of this country properly by simply prohibiting certain acts. I believe it is well enough where there is some conspicuous practice that is well known to be obnoxious and dangerous to the people to prohibit that, and perhaps at this session of Congress in all of our antitrust legislation we may prohibit one or two or three or four things; but then Congress adjourns. Business will comply with these prohibitions, will abstain from the few things we prohibit; but the next day, the next month, or the next year business concerns will invent other practices which are unfair and destructive of competition, which are dangerous to the people, and which enable the big corporations to go on in the same course as before.

Therefore the proper thing to do is to legislate in general terms, to comprehend and include all kinds of acts and practices which are objectionable. Then give this great commission, to be composed of men of the highest grade and character, the authority to make rules and regulations that will prohibit specific acts and practices coming within the general classes prohibited by the general terms of the act. I have had considerable experience in the administration of the public-land laws. The statute gives to the Secretary of the Interior the power to make rules and regulations to govern the disposition of the public lands, and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior, an executive officer, have the force and effect of law.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I yield for a question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Merely for a question. Does the gentleman think the power of the Government to deal with its own lands is analogous to the power of the Government to deal with private business of the country?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, Mr. Chairman, that raises a question. If these corporations which you have placed under this law are, strictly speaking, private businesses, then we should not lay the strong hand of the Federal Government upon them at all. It is only upon the theory that these corporations have gone beyond strictly private business concerns that the Federal Government lays its hands upon them. [Applause.] If our big corporations are strictly private businesses, then let them go. But I maintain they have attained such proportions that they have ceased to be strictly private concerns. They have become impressed with a public use, they are of public consequence, and it is only upon that ground and theory that the Federal Government is justified in even compelling them to make report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK) there were—ayes 18, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That every corporation engaged in commerce, excepting corporations subject to the acts to regulate commerce, which, by itself or with one or more other corporations owned, operated, controlled, or organized in conjunction with it so as to constitute substantially a business unit, has a capital of not less than $5,000,000, or, having a less capital, belongs to a class of corporations which the commission may designate, shall furnish to the commission annually such information, statements, and records of its organization, bondholders and stockholders, and financial condition, and also such information, statements, and records of its relation to other corporations and its business and practices while engaged in commerce as the commission shall require; and to enable it the better to carry out the purposes of this act the commission may prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports. The said annual reports shall contain all the required information and statistics for the period of 12 months ending with the fiscal year of each corporation's report, and they shall be made out under oath or otherwise, in the discretion of the commission, and filed with the commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission. The commission may also require such special reports as it may deem advisable.

If any corporation subject to this section of this act shall fail to make and file said annual reports within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make and file any special report within the time fixed by the order of the commission, such corporation shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue in default in making or filing said annual or special reports. Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of the acts to regulate commerce.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer two amendments to this section, which are in the nature of the same subject and ought to be voted upon separately; and I request that I may offer these together, and that I may have my entire time in one speech on them.

Mr. ADAMSON. In reference to the amendment which the gentleman from Kansas proposes to offer, I wish to ask if that is the bill which he introduced?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not in its entirety, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would not the gentleman consent that it may be printed?

Mr. MURDOCK. I was going to ask that, if I could not have, inasmuch as I am liable to——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have been recognized to offer my amendments first.

Mr. ADAMSON. I assure the gentleman from Oklahoma that he shall not suffer——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma has the floor. Does the gentleman decline to be interrupted?

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not intend to object. I am trying to agree with both these gentlemen with regard to the time for debate on this section.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield, as he has made his request?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I will yield in order for the gentleman to make his request, if this is not to come out of my time.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is no time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I rose for the purpose of trying to reach an agreement with both gentlemen.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, with the permission of the gentleman from Oklahoma, that inasmuch as I am liable to be cut out of a motion to recommit I will take the vital part of my bills giving the interstate trade commission more power——

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman means passing some laws instead of giving power.

Mr. MURDOCK. And I offer it as an amendment. It is very long, and I am not disposed to delay the committee in the consideration of this measure; and I was going to request that I be allowed to offer the amendment, and that it may be printed, and that I might be heard upon it for five minutes in the interest of the expedition of business.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that request will be agreed to by the committee. The bills have been printed and they have been available for everybody who cared to read them, and I hope the committee will agree to this.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request?

Mr. MURDOCK. That I offer an amendment to have it printed in lieu of reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment and asks unanimous consent that it be printed without it being read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman wishes to do when he is recognized?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is now proposing to offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will permit, I am trying to agree with both of the gentlemen as to time on this section, and I will make a general inquiry before it is wound up.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]:

Page 9, line 6, after the word "commerce," insert the following:

"Provided further, That the interstate trade commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent all corporations or associations subject to the jurisdiction of said commission from engaging in or practicing such unfair or oppressive competition as are hereinafter defined and as are hereby declared unlawful.

"That unfair or oppressive competition as used in this act is hereby defined to include the following business practices and transactions:

"(a) The acceptance or procurement of rates or terms of service from common carriers not granted to other shippers under like conditions.

"(b) The acceptance or procurement of rates or terms of service from common carriers declared unlawful by the act entitled 'An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States,' approved February 19, 1903, as amended.

"(c) Discrimination in selling prices as between localities or individuals which is not justified by differences in cost of distributon.

"(d) Procuring, by bribery or any illegal means, information as to the secrets of competitors, or procuring conduct on the part of employees of competitors inconsistent with their duties to their employers.

"(e) The making of oppressive exclusive contracts for the sale of articles of which the seller has a substantial monopoly, whether by patent or otherwise, or oppressive exclusive contracts depending upon or connected with such articles.

"(f) The maintenance of secret subsidiaries or secretly controlled agencies held out as independent of the corporation or association controlling the same and used for any of the foregoing purposes of unfair competition.

"(g) The destruction of competition through the use of interlocking directorates.

"(h) Any other business practices involving unfair or oppressive competition.

"Provided, That whenever the interstate trade commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation or association subject to its jurisdiction has been or is engaged in unfair or oppressive competition it shall issue and serve upon said corporation or association a written order, at least 30 days in advance of the time set therein for hearing, directing said corporation or association to appear before said commission and show cause why an order shall not be issued by said commission restraining and prohibiting said corporation or association from such practice or transaction, and if upon such hearing the commission shall be of the opinion that the practice or transaction in question is prohibited by this act it shall thereupon issue such order restraining the same. The commission may at any time modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any order issued by it under this act.

"Provided further, That whenever said commission, upon the issuing of such restraining order, shall find that said corporation or association has not complied therewith said commission may petition the district court of the United States, within any district where the act in question took place or where the said corporation or association is located or carries on business, asking said court to issue an injunction to enforce the terms of such order of the commission; and such court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction, and also, in case of any violation of such injunction, in the discretion of the court, to issue an order restraining and enjoining said corporation or association from engaging in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations for such time as said court may order.

"Provided further, That the interstate trade commission is hereby empowered and directed at any time, either upon its own initiative or upon the representation or complaint of any person, corporation, or association, to investigate the organization, conduct, and management of any corporation or association subject to the jurisdiction of the said commission for the purpose of determining whether such corporation or association exercises a substantially monopolistic power in any industry in which said corporation or association is engaged; that any such corporation or association shall be regarded as exercising 'a substantially monopolistic power' whenever such corporation or association, not being subject to the obligation of public service in the given industry in question, exercises control over a sufficient portion of such industry or over sufficient factors therein to determine the price policy in that industry, either as to raw materials or finished or partly finished products. Such substantially monopolistic power exercised over commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy; and whenever after such investigation the said commission shall find that such corporation or association exercises such substantially monopolistic power the commission is hereby further empowered and directed to determine by such further investigation as may be necessary whether such monopolistic power is based primarily on artificial or on natural bases.

"Artificial bases shall, for the purposes of this act, be defined as the practices of unfair or oppressive competition as heretofore defined in this act.

"Natural bases shall, for the purposes of this act, be defined as—"(a) Control of natural resources.

"(b) Control of terminal or transportation facilities.

"(c) Control of financial resources.

"(d) Any other economic condition inherent in the character of the industry, including, among such conditions, patent rights.

"That whenever the commission shall find that any corporation or association subject to its jurisdiction exercises a substantially monopolistic power, based primarily on artificial bases as herein defined, it shall be the duty of the commission to proceed forthwith to terminate such monopolistic power by the exercise of its powers heretofore granted to restrain and prohibit unfair or oppressive competition.

"Provided further, That whenever the commission shall find that any corporation or association exercises substantially monopolistic power, based primarily on a natural base or natural bases as herein defined, said commission shall issue and serve upon such corporation or association a written order to said corporation or association specifying such changes in the organization, conduct, or management of its property and business as in the opinion of the commission will most effectively and promptly terminate such monopolistic power, while at the same time safeguarding property rights and business efficiency. The commission in said order shall fix a reasonable time within which the changes ordered shall be put into effect by such corporation or association. That whenever any corporation or association upon which such an order has been served shall refuse or neglect to comply with the same, the commission shall apply to the district court of the United States in any district where such corporation or association is located or carries on business, asking for an order by said court for the appointment of a supervisor or supervisors of such corporation or association, and it shall be the duty of such court, upon such request by the commission to appoint for a limited time such supervisor or supervisors for such corporation or association and to give such supervisors such powers as are usually granted to receivers and full power of such direction and control over the organization, conduct, and management of such corporation or association and the business and property thereof as shall be best fitted to carry into effect the order of the commission. The supervisor or supervisors shall from time to time, upon the request of the commission, make full report to the commission as to the organization and business of such corporation or association, and said supervisor or supervisors shall have power to carry out any further orders which the commission shall from time to time make relating to such corporation or association.

"Provided further, That any court in terminating a supervisorship imposed as provided in this act may, in order to insure the permanency of competitive conditions, include in its decree a provision submitting the supervised corporation or association and its business, or any part thereof, to the supervision or direction of the commission for such time and in such manner as said court shall fix, and the commission shall be empowered to exercise such supervisory or directory power as shall be conferred in said decree.

"And whenever the commission shall conduct an investigation for the purpose of determining whether a corporation or association exercises substantially monopolistic power as defined in this act or of determining the basis of such power, reasonable opportunity shall be granted in the course of the investigation to such corporation or association to be heard or to present evidence in its own behalf; and before the entry of any order requiring changes in the organization, conduct, or management of the property and business of any corporation or association the commission shall issue and serve upon such corporation or association a written order at least 30 days in advance of the time set for hearing, directing said corporation or association to appear before the commission and show cause why an order should not be issued requiring such changes. The commission may at any time modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any order issued by it under this act.

"Provided further, That service of process, orders, or notices under the provisions of this act may be had by service on any officer or agent of any incorporated organization or on any member or agent of any unincorporated organization, and failure by any corporation or association or by the officers or agents of any such corporation or association, subject to any of the provisions of this act, to comply with the terms hereof or failure or refusal to furnish information required by the commission within 60 days after written demand for such information, shall constitute a misdemeanor and shall be punished by fine of not more than $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such neglect or failure. Any person who shall willfully make or give to said commission any false or deceptive return or statement required by this act, knowing the same to be false or calculated to deceive in any material particular, shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or by both fine and imprisonment."

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Oklahoma will kindly state what time he desires, and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will state what he wants——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I will state that I have offered them together because they refer to the same subject. I prefer to offer them together and make my speech all at once, and I would like to have a total of 15 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much will the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. MANN. We want 15 minutes over here.

Mr. ADAMSON. Fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] and——

Mr. MANN. And 15 minutes here, besides.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. That includes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] want to take any time?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, then, that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] have 15 minutes, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] 5 minutes; and then such time as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] wants he will ask for.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am trying to ascertain how much time my side wants.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is 30 minutes on the various amendments.

Mr. COVINGTON. Does that include the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY]?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. COVINGTON. I ask unanimous consent that the debate close in 50 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. You had better make it an hour.

Mr. COVINGTON. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending sections and all amendments thereto close in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto close in one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Thirty minutes on this side, to be divided as mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. And 30 minutes of that time to be divided as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. ADAMSON. And I to control 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] to control 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. And I take it the amendments will be voted upon as they are presented.

Mr. ADAMSON. Each amendment will be presented, read, and voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments will be reported for information——

Mr. MANN. No; to be disposed of as they are presented, without coming out of the time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 15 minutes. The Clerk will first report the amendments offered by him.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, line 2, after the word "furnish," insert "under oath"; and in line 4, after the comma following the word "organization" and before the word "bondholders," insert "together with the names and addresses of its"; and in line 4, after the comma following the word "bondholders" and before the word "and," insert "and its officers and employees," so that lines 2, 3, and 4 will read as follows: "commission may designate, shall furnish, under oath, to the commission annually such information, statements, and records of its organization, together with the names and addresses of its bondholders and stockholders, and its officers and employees, and financial."

Also, on page 8, line 20, after the word "advisable," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add the following: "and the records, books, and papers of such corporation shall be at all times liable and subject to the full visitorial and inquisitorial powers of the United States by the said commission; and said commission, or either of them or its authorized representatives, shall also have the right at all times to inspect the books and papers of such corporation and to examine, under oath, any officer, agent, or employee of such corporation in relation to its business or affairs, and to require from them from time to time special reports and statements, under oath, concerning their business or affairs and in all matters pertaining to the public visitation; and within the jurisdiction of the commission it shall have the powers and authority of a court of record to administer oaths, to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers, to punish as for contempt any person guilty of disrespectful or disorderly conduct in the presence of the commission while in session, or to enforce compliance with any of its lawful orders or requirements by adjudging and by enforcing its own appropriate process against the delinquent or offending party or corporation (after it shall have been first duly proceeded against by due process of law before the commission, sitting as a court, and afforded an opportunity to be heard upon the reasonableness of the order or requirement alleged to have been violated) such fines or other penalties as may be prescribed or authorized by this act. Any corporation failing or refusing to obey any lawful order or requirement of the commission within reasonable time, not less than 10 days, as shall be fixed by the order, may be fined by the commission in such sum not exceeding $500, as the commission may deem proper (or such sum in excess of $500 as may be prescribed or authorized by law); and each day's continuance of such failure or refusal, after due service upon such corporation of the order or requirement of the commission, shall be a separate offense; and no court, except the Supreme Court of the United States, shall issue any writ of prohibition, injunction, or any order restraining the said commission, or take any appeal from its orders made in pursuance of this act.

"Whenever any such corporation shall violate any of the lawful orders of the commission the said commission shall certify such fact to the Postmaster General, who shall thereupon issue a fraud order against such corporation, and thereafter exclude such corporation, its officers and employees, from the use of the mails until such order is completely complied with."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the committee reporting this bill, the purpose of this law is to get certain information as a "clearing house" for the corporations; second, to aid in the enforcement of law; third, to predicate legislation on recommendations by the President.

As a bill for a "clearing house" which could serve for the most part only the corporations themselves, this bill meets all the requirements. But when you provide only these means it will only give you such information as they desire to give out. If you want such information as will be necessary to enforce the law and to predicate legislation upon, you will have to get much information that they will not voluntarily give up. They must then be compelled to "disgorge." You can not get the information unless you give to the commission seeking it the power to get it. I want to say that I hope my Democratic associates will not attempt to vote down this amendment and then go out to the people and boast about what they and the party have done, because they will have done no more than to provide for a "clearing house" for the corporations of the country. The object of the bill is good and sound; but we want all the facts. To get all the facts you must give to this commission all the power necessary to get them. Under the bill the commission, it is true, can "make the order," but after they have made the order they have no power to enforce it. They must first either go to the grand jury or prosecuting attorney and get an indictment or complaint against the refusing corporation; and then, after that, delays and extensions probably will be had, and perhaps the trust would rather pay the fine than give up the information, or the commission may go into court and get some kind of a remedial writ, such as a mandatory injunction. If you really want the information, you must give this commission the power of a "court of record" for such purpose, and there is the key to getting the information.

And I call your attention again to the fact that you provide for the giving up of the stockholders and bondholders, but not their addresses. If you attempt to prosecute under this bill, you will be compelled to construe the statute strictly to such things only named in the law. Why not make the trusts give their addresses and the names of their officers and employees?

Now, I have been asked why do this? Because in the experience of the Oklahoma Corporation Commission, and my amendment is largely copied from the Oklahoma constitution, with which I had something to do in the making, in a certain suit before the commission they could not get the information except through the employees. After they had compelled the railroads to give the names of their employees the commission stationed one of their representatives, with the power to investigate the books, the records, and papers, at every depot of this railroad in the State, and instructed them at a given moment by the clock to walk into the agent's office and demand an exhibition of every book, every letter, every order, and every paper in their offices. As a result, they got the complete information that they could not have gotten otherwise than by that process. This is the need for the officers and employees.

This amendment offered by me provides a fourfold remedy. First, the commission is a court of record and with the power, so far as their jurisdiction runs, equal to any of the inferior Federal courts of the United States, and subject only to the Supreme Court of the United States. It then provides the power to punish as for contempt, the power on the part of the commission itself on its own motion to fine or punish, and the further power of having a "fraud order" issued by the Post Office Department. These requirements will get this information.

Now, there may be those who say it is unconstitutional. But, my friends, where is the dead line? Where is the dead line between a private contract and a private corporation and a trust; between private business and public concerns subject to governmental regulation? It is laid down through the Oklahoma Corporation Commission and our State constitution, and which principle has been recently upheld by the United States Supreme Court, to be that where no contract can exist between the citizen and such concern, or where the citizen is powerless to resist the charge, there the trust or corporation of a public character comes in.

The right of Congress or of Government to regulate the rates or affairs of any corporation or concern begins when its nature partakes of such a public aspect as to be monopolistic in its effect or of public concern. A trust begins when contract can not exist. For instance, a railroad is both of a public concern and in the nature of a trust because the citizens must pay the charges made, because there is no other method by which he can travel by rail. The same is true of a telephone or telegraph company or a pipe line. In like manner is a cotton gin or grain separator a public concern, and they partake of the nature of trusts when they control a given area and are left without competition. To illustrate, as occurred in Oklahoma, if there be but one cotton gin or grain separator in a community ginning for hire, and should it attempt in the midst of the ginning season to withdraw its use from the public and offer to buy the cotton, under which condition there could be no competitor in the field, it becomes of such "trust nature" as to authorize its regulation by law and the authority of a public-service commission to compel it to gin cotton should it attempt in the midst of the ginning season to withdraw its service from the public.

A very recent decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of German Alliance Insurance Co., appellant, against Ike Lewis, as superintendent of insurance of the State of Kansas, rendered about a month ago, to wit, April 20, 1914, with Mr. Justice McKenna delivering the opinion of the court, in part says:

> The specific error complained of is the refusal of the district court to hold that the act of the State of Kansas is unconstitutional and void. * * * To support this charge of error complainant asserts that the business of fire insurance is a private business, and therefore there is no constitutional power in a State to fix the rates and charges for services rendered by it.
> * * * It indeed would be a strained contention that the Government could not avail itself, in the exercise of power it might deem wise to exert, of the skill and knowledge possessed by the world. We may put aside, therefore, all merely adventitious considerations and come to the bare and essential one, whether a contract of fire insurance is private and, as such, has constitutional immunity from regulation. Or, to state it differently and to express an antithetical proposition, is the business of insurance so far affected with a public interest as to justify legislative regulation of its rates? * * * We can best explain by examples. The transportation of property—business of common carriers—is obviously of public concern, and its regulation is an accepted governmental power. * * *
> The principle was expressed to be, quoting Lord Chief Justice Hale, "that when private property is affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only," and it becomes "clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large"; and so using it, the owner "grants to the public an interest in that use and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good." * * * It is the business that is the fundamental thing; property is but its instrument, the means of rendering the service which has become of public interest.
> * * * What makes for the general welfare is necessarily, in the first instance, a matter of legislative judgment, and a judicial review of such judgment is limited. "The scope of judicial inquiry in deciding the question of power is not to be confused with the scope of legislative considerations in dealing with the matter of policy." * * *
> On the other hand, to the insured insurance is an asset, a basis of credit. It is practically a necessity to business activity and enterprise. It is therefore essentially different from ordinary commercial transactions, and, as we have seen, according to the sense of the world from the earliest times—certainly the sense of the modern world—is of the greatest public concern. It is therefore within the principle we have announced. * * *

How can it be said that the right to engage in the business is a natural one when it can be denied to individuals and permitted to corporations? How can it be said to have the privilege of a private business when its dividends are restricted, its investments controlled, the form and extent of its contracts prescribed, discriminations in its rates denied, and a limitation on its risks imposed? * * *

We may venture to observe that the price of insurance is not fixed over the counters of the company by what Adam Smith calls the higgling of the market, but formed in the councils of the underwriters, promulgated in schedules of practically controlling constancy which the applicant for insurance is powerless to oppose, and which, therefore, has led to the assertion that the business of insurance is of monopolistic character and that "it is illusory to speak of a liberty of contract." * * *

The Corporation Commission of Oklahoma, operating under this construction of a "trust" and the provision I here offer, with a further power to control, just a few seasons ago acted wisely and effectively along this line when appealed to by the farmers, when a cotton gin in their community, and the only gin, stopped ginning, and offered to buy the cotton, and there was no competition, and the farmers were at the mercy of the owner of that gin. They appealed, in their desperation, to the Corporation Commission of Oklahoma, and the commission issued an order, on the theory of the decision I have quoted, that there was not the relation of a contract of a private character with respect to the cotton gin, and proceeded to order them to show cause why they should not gin that cotton, and, after a hearing, compelled that cotton gin to proceed and gin at the rate it had charged at the time it stopped. I grant you that a gin might withdraw its service from the public, but not in the gin season. It must do this at the close of the season and at a time when the public can provide other means. The same principle exists as to grain thrashers. It ought to exist as to every concern that has any public character or nature. And under this decision of the United States Supreme Court it will exist, and I say, therefore, there is nothing in any objection that this legislation or this fact is unconstitutional.

Now, I call your attention further to the fact that much information of corporations of a public character can not be had without some legislation of this character, and we need that legislation. We howl on every stump about the Standard Oil Trust, and yet there is to be found nowhere in any governmental or State records any records to determine anything about their business. And yet they go into the midcontinental oil field of Kansas, Oklahoma, and elsewhere where the independent oil operators are at work, and, under the plea that there is overproduction, destroy the independent operators and take possession of their property.

We ought to have the information that will determine the amount of the output of the crude product, of the refined product, of the demand each year of the country and of the world at large, so that we may determine on any day what is the output and determine with certainty whether there is an overproduction or whether this is but a plea of that trust to rob the people of their property. This commission seeks to do that; but it is powerless to do it unless you give the power to the commission itself. While they are going off to prosecute, or to seek a remedial writ in some court, the corporation will escape, and the result is you have a commission that you may brag about, but in which there is no virtue. It is a "Mother Hubbard" remedy—it covers everything, but touches nothing.

I want to appeal to the gentlemen of this House who look with dread upon Government ownership—and I include myself as one of you—that unless you meet these conditions, so that there will be a remedy, Government ownership and socialism will sweep over this country with all their attendant evils. [Applause.] Socialists—yes, anarchists—are made by bad laws and oppressive government.

There is a remedy, and if this Government will furnish that remedy with the same provision that we provide for the intrastate corporations of Oklahoma, we shall stop that clamor. You can not push back that tide any longer. This Government rests upon a powder mine, with an anarchist, match in hand, ready to touch off the explosion whenever he has an opportunity, and that explosion would blow up your corporations and civilization as well. You have here a bill for remedial legislation, a bill that has for its object a good purpose, but a bill that has absolutely no power to accomplish that object, and it never will have that power so long as you permit the inferior Federal judges to interfere with it by their writs. You have declined to give that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McKELLAR). The gentleman has consumed 12 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Then I will continue for the remaining 3 minutes.

I do not wish to attack all the Federal courts. I believe, and know, that the Supreme Court has been, since the beginning of this Government, with few exceptions, holding straight to the law and sound policy, and a few years ago, when they amended their rules, they took a step in the line of progress greater than any that Congress itself has made. But there are many inferior Federal judges like one sent to my State, that enjoined the 2-cent fare, and we can not escape the conclusion that that judge was a corrupt judge, because his boy happened to be employed in the office of the very railroad company that the judge served with his injunction.

It is these things that cause the people to become impatient and to adopt those things that will not meet the situation, and cry not only against that court but all Federal courts, and these are the things that reflect upon the Supreme Court itself. I have the utmost faith in the Supreme Court, but I have no more faith in many of the inferior Federal courts than I have in a common "nigger," and I say to you the only way to stop this howl against the courts is to take away that jurisdiction and give it only to the Supreme Court, where the Constitution intended it to lie.

Put into this bill the powers provided for in this amendment and you will not only make of this commission a "clearing house for the corporations," but you will make that a power by which we can enforce the law in the Interstate Commerce Commission and in the corporation commissions of the various States, and we will give the President and Congress not a part of the evidence but the whole evidence. It is absurd to think that we can wisely legislate for corporation or farmer, for banker or merchant unless we have all the facts about his conditions, and you can not get these facts unless you adopt this provision. Our commission in Oklahoma can walk into any railroad office at any moment and say, "Open up your books; let me see your records." And they do not hesitate to obey.

Why should we not give this power to this commission? Why should we not lodge in that commission some power whereby that information can be had? You have your opportunity now to do it, and to go home and say, "We have accomplished the result," or else to vote it down and enact this bill as it is and go home and say to the people that you have done wonders, but in time they will find it is not true, and when they find out it is not true the Democratic Party will be swept from power and something else will arise that will plague you and the Government itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. That is a good place to stop—"something else will arise." [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] five minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, section 2 of the Constitution provides that in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction. As I understand the latter part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], it would give to the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in matters coming before the trade commission. This would be in violation of the Constitution.

The object and purpose of our committee in framing this bill was not to create out of this commission a court. We believed that the commission should be practically a branch of the legislative department of the Government, administering the rights which are granted to it by the bill itself. We could not delegate to it our legislative functions, but we could circumscribe the limits within which it should operate. This trade commission is not to be a court, but an administrative body to aid the courts in securing evidence and carrying out their decrees.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I have only five minutes.

Now, with reference to the gentleman's first amendment, requiring that the addresses of stockholders and bondholders be given, that is already covered by the first portion of section 9, wherein it is prescribed that—

A class of corporations which the commission may designate shall furnish to the commission annually such information, statements, and records of its organization, bondholders and stockholders, and financial condition, and also such information, statements, and records of its relation to other corporations and its business and practices while engaged in commerce as the commission shall require.

Information as to bondholders and stockholders would include the addresses of bondholders and stockholders if, in the judgment of the commission, that information was deemed necessary or proper.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman recognize the old principle of the Roman law that has come down to us——

Mr. ESCH. Expressio unius exclusio alterius.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That the exclusion of specific things common to the general premises means the inclusion of everything else.

Mr. ESCH. I understand the principle very well, but that language is broad enough to give the gentleman the information he seeks.

Then the other part of his proposed amendment, it seems to me, is covered by the latter paragraph of section 10, wherein we provide that—

> For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation or proceeding authorized by this section the commission, or its duly authorized agent or agents, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against.

And further along the same line of authority we say, in section 16—

> That for the purposes of this act, and in aid of its powers of investigation herein granted, the commission shall have and exercise the same powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission in the acts to regulate commerce to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and to administer oaths. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said acts to regulate commerce and by the act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved February 11, 1893, and the act defining immunity, approved June 13, 1906, shall apply to witnesses, testimony, and documentary evidence before the commission.

There is power which is complete enough to meet all the requirements of the gentleman's amendment, and there is no one who now questions the fullness of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to get any evidence which it needs in the prosecution of cases before it.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. They can not do it?

Mr. ESCH. They have done it, and they are doing it to-day in the investigation of the New Haven road, and this proposed bill adds to the powers granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right, which was held lacking in the Louisville & Nashville case as to documentary evidence, as to correspondence. We put that in as an additional power to be granted to this trade commission, which the gentleman and others claim the Interstate Commerce Commission does not possess.

We do not wish to make of this trade commission a court. We can not give it original jurisdiction. It is not a court, but it is a commission to investigate the facts, and having investigated them, recommend appropriate legislation to Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to separate the amendments and to vote on the first one. I ask unanimous consent that the first one be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the amendment may be divided, and that the Clerk report the first part of the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 8, line 2, after the word "furnish," insert "under oath"; and in line 4, after the comma following the word "organization" and before the word "bondholders," insert "together with the names and addresses of its"; and in line 4, after the comma following the word "bondholders" and before the word "and," insert "and its officers and employees," so that lines 2, 3, and 4 will read as follows: "Commission may designate, shall furnish, under oath, to the commission annually such information, statements, and records of its organization, together with the names and addresses of its bondholders and stockholders, and its officers and employees, and financial."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 16, noes 35.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second division of the amendment.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not ask to have that reported again. The committee understands what it is. It is the main proposition. It is not necessary to read it again.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second division of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 18, noes 38.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, 10 Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ADAMSON. After the liberal treatment which the gentleman has had, I wish he would not do that. I do not think he wants to delay action on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

During the count,

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point, as I see there is a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The amendment is rejected, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition on my amendment, which is to be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Has the amendment been read?

Mr. MURDOCK. There was an order of the committee that it should be printed without being read.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I do not know what the gentleman's amendment is. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will explain it to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the time of the gentleman from Kansas will not be counted until he explains to gentlemen who have come in what the agreement was about the amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the agreement in regard to my amendment was this: I wanted to expedite the bill. I believed that I would be cut out of the opportuinty to make a motion to recommit, because there is, under the special rule, only one chance to recommit, which the other minority will probably avail itself of, and I asked and obtained unanimous consent to have the amendment printed, as it was very long and would delay the committee to read it. The amendment contains those essential parts of the Progressive antitrust bills, H. R. 9300 and 9301, which go beyond the field of publicity provided in Progressive bill 9299, and give the commission real power.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if my time may begin now, the underlying philosophy of the pending measure—the Covington bill—is a sort of a childlike belief in the potency of publicity; and, let me say, we in Congress seem to have a pathetic reliance upon publicity and its powers and a singular indifference to our experience in the past with the failures of publicity to correct. We certainly have a singular indifference to the present instances of the impotency of publicity as a means of working great reforms. This very moment Mr. Mellen, ex-president of the New Haven System, is demonstrating that this country can not get in one of its major problems a remedy through publicity. Day before yesterday Mr. Mellen, testifying before the Interstate Commerce Commission, said that he had more bosses when he was the president of the railroad at $60,000 a year than he had when he was a $60 clerk. Along with that testimony he gave ample proof of how futile it is for us to proceed as we are in this feeble sort of legislation.

I do not know whether the Members have read Mr. Mellen's testimony or not, but everyone should read it. When the New Haven System, under dictation of Mr. Morgan, gave for the Westchester Railroad $11,000,000 more than it was worth, a part of the purchase money going as a bribe to politicians—$1,200,000, Mr. Mellen testified—some of the directors came in to protest to Mr. Mellen. One of these men was a Mr. Skinner. Read Mr. Mellen's testimony as given in the newspapers:

> "Holy Cæsarina Philippi!" Mr. Skinner shouted. "What have you been doing here with $11,000,000 of New Haven money?"
> "I'll appoint you a committee of one to find out," I suggested.
> "Not on your life," said Mr. Skinner.
> "There was enough said by Messrs. Hemingway and Skinner to satisfy the other directors," said Mr. Mellen grimly.
> The report was adopted by the board of directors November 9, 1907. Ten days later Mr. Mellen made this notation across the back of the record of the vote:
> "The trouble with this is there is nothing to show who got the money for the truck turned over. I don't like the looks of it. I don't see why the whole matter should not be made plain. If I had the stock and sold it, I should expect others would state they bought it of me, but that doesn't seem to have been the disposition here. I never have known the first thing about who originally held the securities, what they were sold for, and who they are. I thought I was entitled to know."

Here was the president of a railroad who did not know the affairs of his own road.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have only five minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wanted to ask the gentleman if there was not sufficient publicity of that matter now?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, yes; after the horse has been stolen the barn door is locked. What good does publicity do the women and children stockholders now? For nearly 50 per cent of the stockholders of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad are women and children, who suffered through this corrupt deal which the interests made through their instrument, Mr. Mellen.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the law calling for publicity and uniform accounts for the railroads was passed in 1906. This transaction to which Mr. Mellen testifies was subsequent to that. Within the last two years we passed a bill, as the gentleman from Illinois will remember, compelling publicity on the part of newspapers, in the hope that we might know more about the responsible heads of control in newspapers. Did it remedy? Not in the least; nor will this bill. Now, I have submitted an amendment which embodies the principles of the Progressive antitrust measures set forth in constructive legislation. This amendment gives to this commission the power to prohibit and prevent unfair trade practices, on the one hand, and on the other, to distinguish that element in a monopoly which gives it monopolistic power and divorce it from that factor and protect legitimate trade from its power. I hope that the vote in favor of the amendment will not be confined wholly to the Progressives. It is a step, a long step, in advance. It does mean business and will bring remedy, which this bill, the Covington measure, will not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] such time as he desires.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from Kansas is itself his answer. The Interstate Commerce Commission has to-day precisely the information which he speaks about as necessary for the American people to know. There have been no changes in the act to regulate commerce since the distinguished explorer who leads the party to which the gentleman belongs was in the chair of the Presidency of the United States. I understand, and it seems to be common rumor, that the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad had some sort of an understanding with President Roosevelt as to what extent transactions of a certain doubtful sort could take place in New England. At least the press so states.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman makes an attack on Mr. Roosevelt. Will he yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. That transaction is set forth fully in the testimony which Mr. Mellen gave, and it is clearly shown that Col. Roosevelt while President declared that whatever Mr. Mellen did in any of these transactions he could not do anything unlawful while he was President. The fact is that Theodore Roosevelt while he was President had the big stick out for just such malefactors, and he is the only one within the gentleman's official experience and mine who has been after them with the big stick.

Mr. COVINGTON. I want to say in reply to the gentleman that notwithstanding the big stick that was apparently after the malefactors of great wealth, as the colonel once called them, they are operating with greater vehemency than ever before in the history of America, if the lamentations of the Progressive Party are to be accepted.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas knows that when the Bureau of Corporations was first created there was then found by the investigation conducted during the incumbency of President Roosevelt into the affairs of the Beef Trust by James R. Garfield, the then Commissioner of Corporations, abundance of evidence from the innermost sources of the operations of the great corporations constituting that trust to prosecute the individual defendants. No man who knows will dare to say that there was not publicity galore of all the facts that affected the operation of that trust. Whatever may have been the shortcomings of the law, it was not those shortcomings that were incident to publicity.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the prosecution was begun, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, but the gentleman stated that we could not get publicity until after the horse had been stolen.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman knows there was a world of publicity in the Beef Trust transaction, and we failed. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. COVINGTON. Failed for what reason?

Mr. MURDOCK. Failed because the courts could not handle this sort of a proposition; failed because we lacked an administrative body like a real interstate trade commission that could handle it. That is the reason.

Mr. COVINGTON. We failed because the imperfect cooperation of the Commissioner of Corporations with the United States district attorney in Illinois caused individual immunities which made it impossible to reach the situation.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman should not forget the jury which acquitted the gentlemen, after a strong case.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman wants to state fairly the situation about that Beef Trust prosecution. Where immunity was granted, it was because of the efforts to get information and make it public.

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, yes; but I will recall to the gentleman from Illinois the fact that the President himself directed the Commissioner of Corporations to furnish to the district attorney the information which granted the immunity. It was the direct result of the immunity granted by President Roosevelt that the individual defendants escaped conviction before Judge Humphrey.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman might say in the same connection that it is the President now in the White House who has directed Mr. Folk, chief counsel of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to go ahead before that commission with Mr. Mellen, at the risk of granting him immunity, and that against the protest of the Attorney General, Mr. McReynolds; and it all goes to prove, as the gentleman himself said, that publicity does not reach this sore spot, and publicity is the whole essence of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, not by a great deal. Publicity not accompanied by immunity is a sufficient corrective to-day for many of the evils that still exist in the industrial world, but the publicity we are now getting regarding the New Haven Railroad is not by the direction of the President of the United States to Mr. Folk. President Wilson has had nothing whatever to do with that situation. He has strictly adhered to his duty to let the Department of Justice take care of the Government's case.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has distinctly declared that this proceeding is on its account, by its own independence, without direction from or control by anybody; and I do not know but that the Attorney General would have very much better been able to deal with the situation if he had not been interfered with by the commission and its solicitor.

I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK) there were—ayes 14, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 13, after the word "year," strike out the words "of each corporation's report."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this bill corporations are allowed to determine when they shall file their reports, because the bill allows the reports to be filed subsequent to the expiration of the fiscal year of the corporation and not the fiscal year of the Government. I think it would be vastly better to have it the fiscal year of the Government. In fact, there is no possible way in which we can make any uniform system of reporting for purposes of comparison unless it shall be the fiscal year of the Government and not the fiscal year of the corporation. My amendment would strike out the words "of each corporation's report" and leave it to require the reports for the fiscal year of the Government, in order that they might be uniform reports.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is not that accomplished now by the provisions of the corporation or the income-tax law?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 14, strike out "or otherwise, in the discretion of the commission."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is merely to require that the annual report should be under oath. The language of the bill would allow the commission to determine whether or not it would require the annual reports to be made by corporations to be made under oath. It seems to me that such a vastly important matter as must be the annual report of these corporations to this commission—to the Government of the United States—should be made under oath.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, under the order of the committee the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] was to have five minutes. He proposed to offer an amendment. I understand the Committee on the Judiciary, of which he is a member, is having a meeting to pay a tribute to the distinguished chairman of that committee, who is leaving the House. I therefore ask unanimous consent that we may return to this section later in the day, in order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may offer his amendment under the time restriction already agreed upon in the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. Suppose we make sure of his return by letting it go to the end of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I think probably he would want to offer it before that.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well, if he comes in.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the section be passed over temporarily in order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] may be permitted at a later time in the day to offer a proposed amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That upon the direction of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress the commission shall investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation. The report of the commission may include recommendations for readjustment of business, in order that the corporation investigated may thereafter maintain its organization, management, and conduct of business in accordance with law. Reports made after investigation under this section may be made public in the discretion of the commission.

For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation or proceeding authorized by this section, the commission, or its duly authorized agent or agents, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON:

Page 9, line 22, after the word "against," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and in addition thereto the commission is hereby empowered to make all necessary rules, regulations, orders, and decrees for the enforcement of the powers herein granted, and the rules, regulations, orders, and decrees of such commission in any such matters shall be binding and conclusive against all persons, firms, and corporations."

Mr. DILLON. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if I can have 15 minutes on this and another amendment which I desire to offer?

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to ask the Chair if it is not substantially an amendment that has already been disposed of?

Mr. DILLON. No; it covers different items.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the wish on that side? How much time does anybody want on this section?

Mr. MANN. Is this an amendment to section 10?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I understood the gentleman from South Dakota stated he had another amendment which he would like to offer, and he desired to speak on both.

Mr. MANN. Make it 15 minutes on this side on the section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I reserve 15 minutes to this side. I might not use it, but I will ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes, one half the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. Is there objection?

Mr. DILLON. I want 15 minutes, because I was unable to secure time in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I send up a second amendment which I would like to have reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON:

Page 9, line 10, after the word "corporation," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and upon making the investigations the said commission shall have power to make findings, orders, and decrees prohibiting any practice which it deems unfair, any misconduct, unfair methods, unfair competition, acts of oppression, or acts of deception; and such findings, orders, and decrees shall be binding and conclusive and may be enforced in any district court in the United States."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, in 1912 the Republican Party in its platform declared for a Federal trade commission in the following language:

In the enforcement and administration of Federal laws governing interstate commerce and enterprises impressed with a public use engaged therein there is much that may be committed to a Federal trade commission, thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts. This will promote promptness in the administration of the laws and avoid delays and technicalities incident to court procedure.

This bill is a step in the right direction and will have my support. It, however, falls short of the Republican Party's platform declaration.

The interstate trade commission should be granted specific powers in order that it may accomplish effective work and thus justify its creation. This bill makes the trade commission an investigating committee, a mere adjunct to the office of the Attorney General. Unless we can vitalize it with a grant of powers the trade commission will prove inadequate and inefficient to remedy the evils now existing.

The plan is to investigate for the Attorney General and for the President, and have the President recommend to Congress what should be done in the premises. We are informed by the report of the committee that "there can thus be no laxity at the Department of Justice when it is presented with the facts disclosing violations of law." In my judgment the trade commission as an adjunct to the Department of Justice will prove wholly inadequate to remedy the evils that exist in the restraint of trade. What is needed is to give the trade commission power to pass upon all questions of an administrative character, and make its decisions conclusive, leaving nothing for the courts to do except to protect the constitutional rights of the parties.

Combination of capital for carrying on our industries is a necessity and belongs to our modern civilization. The reformer must not destroy the combination of capital because it is necessary to carry forward the great enterprises in which we are now engaged. The trusts and combinations must be our servants, not our masters. Let us rule them and not allow them to rule us.

In addition to the creation of a trade commission, it is important that there should be a national charter act which should provide the terms upon which a national charter should issue to corporations engaged in interstate commerce. It should provide for the limitation of the amount of stock to be issued; require all stock to be paid in money or in the physical valuation of the property. It should provide for the settlement of disputes between the employers and the employees. It should grant powers to the trade commission and give such commission absolute control of all national incorporations, and permit the commission, when in its judgment a trust has been formed, to fix maximum rates and maximum prices. The sovereign power should, through its trade commission, bring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce under Government inspection and regulation.

It should further provide that all State corporations engaged in interstate commerce should be compelled to take out a Government license in order to engage in interstate commerce and be subject to the contractual features provided in the national incorporation act and be subject to Government inspection and regulation. No State corporation should be given a Government license until a showing was made to the trade commission that its stock represented full money or property value.

The practice of issuing millions of dollars of watered stock to favorite directors should no longer be tolerated. Such practice is not honest, not fair to the stockholders nor to the public. The trade commission should determine the amount of stock that might be issued by any corporation and be given power to prevent a useless and unnecessary centralization of capital into one corporation. In the place of having a billion-dollar corporation, it could have two or more smaller corporations, and thus be able to restore competition and regulate all corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The State corporations, with their billions of dollars of watered stock, never should be permitted to obtain national protection as long as the corporate stock fails to represent full money and property value.

The attempt to control the corporations through the judiciary will fail. The judiciary with its delays, its technicalities, and uncertainties is wholly inadequate to regulate or control the trusts and combinations. The legislative department of government does not need the aid of the courts in regulating legislative or administrative matters. The courts have been extremely zealous in upholding the rights of the judiciary and have in many respects assumed legislative functions, and the time has come when the legislative department should uphold its rights and sustain its legislative enactments. The legislative department is, or should be, as honest as the judiciary, and the place to correct its errors is at the polls.

The right to declare what is a reasonable rate for transporting freight and passengers is a legislative function. It involves disputed questions of fact—matters of public policy. The railroad commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission, composed of skilled, experienced men, are better able to pass upon the question of rates than the courts. We should assume that they are honest, because they take their oath to support the Constitution the same as the judges. There is no reason why one should be more honest than the other. The legislative department may fix the rates, but the courts have reserved the right to say whether the rates so fixed are reasonable or unreasonable. The judiciary has thus taken away the final right of the legislative department to pass upon these disputed questions, these matters of public policy. The right in the legislative department is of slight value when it is not final but intermediate. The courts hear the evidence and say the rates so fixed, in its opinion, are too low for the company to pay dividends on its stock. In this way the courts speak finally and conclusively and becomes the superior power. By the same right the judiciary can dig ditches, review orders for building bridges, cattle guards, and railroad crossings which the legislative department deemed necessary. The judiciary having thus assumed powers and functions not its own, and having encroached upon the legislative department, the time is now at hand when we should in every way possible develop the administrative powers of the legislative department of the Government.

Whether the competition in trade is fair or unfair can best be determined by a trade commission. It is not necessary to submit the matter to the courts. We have made but little headway in controlling the trusts and combinations through the courts. Experience teaches us that the legislative department must rely upon administrative boards to carry into effect its congressional enactments. Give the trade commission powers, not to report the facts, but to decide the facts; not to become an adjunct of the judiciary, but independent of the judiciary, and provide that its determination of the facts shall be conclusive, and leave the courts to declare the law upon the findings of the commission and upon the undisputed facts. Give the commission power to enforce its rules, its regulations, and its decrees and the trade commission will be able to restore competition.

Election boards conduct administrative functions when they report the votes cast. Boards of health may, if granted powers, through its rules and regulations, abate nuisances. Administrative power may be given to inspectors of factories. The Interior Department of the Government, through its entire history, has conducted its functions through administrative officers. By the act of May 29, 1830, the right of preemption was given to certain settlers on the public lands. It required "proof of settlement or improvement shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver." It was held that their decision was conclusive in that no appeal was given. The determination of any ministerial officer may by statute be declared final and conclusive, but such finality does not change its character and transform it from an executive to a judicial act.

Investigations by the trade commission would not constitute a judicial act. It would not take away any vested rights nor would it deny to anyone his constitutional rights. The due process of law does not mean a hearing before a court, but the right is secure when the investigation is had upon notice. No one doubts the power of the Government to control the practices of industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The commission should investigate all misconduct, unfair and dishonest methods, unfair competition, all methods bringing about combinations, acts of oppression, and fraudulent methods of discrimination. The commission should be given the right to give standards of conduct in corporate affairs and to prepare a moral code in the conduct of corporate affairs. The bill proclaims that the judiciary must lead the way out of the industrial wilderness. If we rely on the judiciary, our progress must necessarily be slow. We prefer to place our hopes and aspirations in an administrative board, a board that would not be hampered by appeals, delays, and technicalities.

Congress has the power to enact rules for the regulation of future conduct, future rights, and future controversies. Give the trade commission the full power to make rules, regulations, and decrees and full power to enforce its mandates. Declare that its decisions upon disputed facts shall be final and leave the courts nothing to pass upon except the constitutional rights of the parties and we will give to the country a trade commission that will do the business and its mission will be justified by the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first amendment, offered by the gentleman from South Dakota, which the Clerk will report.

The first amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the first amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the second amendment, offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, which the Clerk will report.

The second amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the second amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I now ask that we return to section 9, under the order of the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. After the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] returns; he wished to be here when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] spoke. I ask the gentleman to withhold his request until the gentleman from Maryland returns.

Mr. MANN. I will do so.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that to section 10?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out the words "any documentary evidence." in line 21, page 9, of section 10 of the bill, and substitute therefor the words "any books, papers, or documents."

Mr. ADAMSON. Debate is exhausted on this subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman yield a few minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. ADAMSON. It not only was exhausted but the same amendment was offered in another place and voted down.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think debate was not quite exhausted on our side. The gentleman from South Dakota yielded back the remainder of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had two minutes remaining.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am willing for that to be used.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the sole object of this amendment is to do away with what I consider an ambiguity of expression. The term "evidence," as I understand it, means proper testimony. It does not mean any testimony, it does not mean any books or papers, but it means such as a court might consider proper to be offered in evidence or proper to go before the court in the determination of the controversy. Now, when you use the expression "documentary evidence" here in this bill it presupposes that somebody is going to pass upon whether or not the papers or documents should constitute evidence, and so in order to clear away the ambiguity I have offered this amendment to make any books, papers, or documents proper to be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Not on this side. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to call the attention of the committee to an evident omission on the part of the gentleman from West Virginia to consider that the definition of "documentary evidence" alluded to by him in line 21, page 9, is clearly covered by the definition of "documentary evidence" beginning at line 13, page 6, so that the very papers and evidence which the gentleman desires to be covered are wholly cared for in the definition itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois asked that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] be allowed to recur in order to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I present an amendment to section 9, and ask to have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania:
"Page 8, line 2, after the word 'commission' insert the words 'after investigation,' and after the word 'designate' insert the words 'as tending to create unlawful restraints of interstate trade or monopolies.'"

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this, it seems to me, is a very important amendment. Following, as I have tried to do, the purpose and thought of the committee which has reported this measure, I feel sure that they desire by this section to create a limitation so that there shall be a point beyond which the application of this bill will not extend. That limitation is found in the use of the language which I now quote from the bill, as follows:

That every corporation engaged in commerce, excepting corporations subject to the acts to regulate commerce, which, by itself or with one or more other corporations owned, operated, controlled, or organized in conjunction with it so as to constitute substantially a business unit, has a capital of not less than $5,000,000, or, having a less capital, belongs to a class of corporations which the commission may designate, shall furnish—

And so forth.

Now, my amendment would simply change that section of the bill so as to read:

A business unit, has a capital of not less than $5,000,000, or, having a less capital, belongs to a class of corporations which the commission after investigation may designate as tending to create unlawful restraints of interstate trade on monopolies.

I am sure that every gentleman will recognize that, as this particular part of the section now reads, there is no limitation whatever, but it is left absolutely within the discretion of the commission and covers every corporation in the land. And as there has been a great deal of protest coming up from the rank and file of the people against harrying and harassing business it would be well if we did not allow this act to extend to every corporation in this country, no matter whether its capitalization be $10,000 or $5,000,000. You may say it is left to the discretion of the commission. True; but we should define the limit of that discretion and we should say that only where it appeared upon investigation that corporations possessing less capital than $5,000,000 were corporations tending to restrain trade or create monopolies, should they be required to make reports, and be subjected to investigation and supervision.

Every lawyer in this body will recognize that there is no power in the Government to interfere with ordinary business; that there are certain well-founded bases upon which interference may be allowed. One is where a corporate existence is stamped with the public service. Another is under the Sherman law, wherever it appears to be a monopoly or existing in restraint of trade. Our legislation should be aimed at these things and circumscribed and limited in its application to them. I venture to suggest that in the passage of this bill as it is at present worded and framed an injury will be done to the general business of the country. You will hear editorial comment in our papers, and individual comment in our papers, about giving business a rest from interference and from supervision and from control, and the governmental hand of control should never be laid upon business, to interfere with its freedom, except where it is justified by the overshadowing necessity to create some public good. Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I ask, with a view of bettering the bill, and with no thought inimical to it, that the committee consider this amendment as one which will increase its efficiency and protect the community from attack and from useless requirements that can not help in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think I have about 10 minutes reserved, have I not, on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 15 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I wish five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the general purpose of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], but I call his attention to the effect his amendment would have on this section and its effect on the general purposes of the bill. In the first place, this bill is drafted to perform two functions—first, to assist in the judicial power of government in enforcing the laws, and, in the second place, to assist the legislative power of our Government in finding out the right information and in formulating and adopting the right kind of legislation. His amendment would completely restrict this provision to its judicial functions and eliminate completely its legislative functions, so far as reports, general and special, are concerned, covered by this section 9. So that at the very outset the most important duty of this commission—to ascertain the facts and advise concerning legislation concerning all corporations of the class of less than $5,000,000 capital—would be entirely eliminated by his amendment. I know this committee does not desire to so emasculate this measure. In the second place, it applies to a class of corporations which the commission, after investigation, may designate to enforce the laws, and so forth. That amendment, then, would thus be jurisdictional. Before the commission would have authority to classify it must previously ascertain these facts, as required in the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Is not the prior language in the bill intended to be jurisdictional, and was it not the thought of the committee that there might be some corporations below the $5,000 limitation that would not require supervision, and was it not the intent of the committee that all these minor corporations might be exempted from the provisions of the bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, sir; not entirely. There might be circumstances under which a classification should be made as to a class of these corporations included within the scope of the bill, and to that extent it is true. But that is not serious, as is the jurisdictional question of the amendment of the gentleman, which would practically emasculate its aid to judicial proceedings. By placing the words "after investigation" after the word "commission"—investigation for a certain definite purpose—under the decisions of the Supreme Court in the interstate-commerce cases, where the commission, before action, is required to have an opinion based upon ascertained facts of record, would require this commission to investigate first and make the required record in every case desired to be considered. Unless that record be made and these facts developed, the commission would not have any power to make a classification, and thus would be helpless to reach these smaller corporations for any purpose under this section. That would amount substantially, in effect, that before the commission could act it must make a record prescribed by the amendment of the gentleman. That record and its completeness could be attacked in the courts, and any corporation which it was desired to investigate for judicial purposes would have the right to test the question as to such investigation—test that record—and go to the Supreme Court before the commission would have any right to classify, even, in performing its judicial functions, and could not act at all as to these corporations in performing its legislative functions. The result of the amendment of the gentleman would first eliminate all its legislative functions, and, in the second place, would practically eliminate its judicial functions by compelling the jurisdictional question to be raised at all times and allowing the courts to decide upon a matter before the commission could have authority to act.

Now, let me call the attention of the gentleman to some of these small corporations, which it is necessary for the general welfare of the public and for the business corporations themselves to be included within this section. More and more corporations doing business with the public are being impressed with a public use, and more and more legislation and judicial decisions are holding corporations as being impressed with a public use. This is increasingly true as to those which hold themselves out as doing business generally with and for the public.

The decision of the Supreme Court the other day in the Kansas insurance case shows the extent to which the courts will go in impressing ordinary business corporations with a public use. Now, it is the object of this very section to enable these corporations doing comparatively a small or a large business, it may be, in a particular locality, possibly oppressive to the people of that locality, to be brought within the jurisdiction and scope of this commission and compelled to make these facts public, and in that way clean up the evil practices, assist in the observance of the law, and furnish some information which may be of assistance to Congress in its work of legislation. The gentleman does not desire to harass such small corporations. Does he not compel just that action by making it jurisdictional to investigate before any can come within the scope of this section? Ordinarily the great majority of them would be exempt from any action under this section. The amendment of the gentleman might compel the commission to go much further, investigate and harass far more, than would be the case as the bill now stands. You not only restrict the powers of the commission but you compel an active and possibly injurious use of the remaining powers, not to the broad advantage of the public.

For that reason, much as I sympathize with the object of the gentleman in not having the business concerns of this country harassed—and none of us want to do that—at the same time this is the occasion for enabling the business concerns of this country to have a chance by which their practices can be open, can be protected, and the high character of the commission that I hope and expect we shall have will protect them in the proper enforcement and administration of this section.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word in answer to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have the time, and I will yield to the gentleman to answer, as he desires.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman. I appreciate the argument of the learned gentleman, and always listen to him with great respect as a lawyer, but I really believe in this instance that his argument is fallacious. There is nothing in the amendment which I have offered which would permit an appeal to the courts, because this looks toward a classification. There would be no individual corporation dealt with and none to appeal from the decision.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Let me ask the gentleman there this question: Could not any corporation that is asked to submit a report coming in the lesser class allege that the commission had not investigated with a view to its doing the things included in your amendment? Could it not raise that question whenever a report was asked for, and would not that be jurisdictional?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not see how it could, and for this reason: The finding of the commission is conclusive, and it classifies those who shall make reports, and it inflicts no penalty. The purpose, undoubtedly, of this bill was to create a limitation below which this system of espionage, search, and seizure should not extend. That was the purpose of the bill. I say, to do that, under this language, every corporation, from the smallest to the biggest, is exposed to this supervisory investigation and exposure of its private affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in the destruction of monopoly. I believe in destroying those things which restrain trade; but I do not believe in putting the business of the country in shackles and in interfering with its freedom. I respectfully submit to you that this amendment would be no more and no less than an admonition to the commission, saying that "Thus far you can go with propriety." The aim and object of all the antitrust laws is to destroy monopoly and to destroy restraint of trade. Wherever you find the practices of any class of corporations, big or little, tending to establish these things, then you may classify them and put them under the rigorous terms of this section of the bill. But if you do not find these things, you can not lay a hand upon them or infringe upon the liberty of business in that respect.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 16508. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 149. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation of the French Republic to participate in an International Congress of Musical Science and History to be held at Paris.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the idea that runs through the mind of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], but I think that upon a very careful analysis of this bill he will find that if the purpose he seeks to accomplish is to restrict investigations to those corporations which have more than $5,000,000 of capital, he has attempted an amendment to the wrong section. This section provides only for one thing, and that is for the filing with the commission by the corporations of the annual and special reports.

Now, the smaller corporations, presumably conforming to the law, ought not to be those corporations that are compelled to do the amount of extra work and have the extra expense incident to the publicity that is the motive for filing annual reports, and, at the direction of the commission, special reports. But, so far as investigations are concerned, the gentleman knows that it was never intended, and is not now intended, under the Sherman law that corporations only of a certain size shall be amenable to the statute. That law is to reach monopoly, no matter by whom created.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Just for a question. Is not this section the jurisdictional section of this bill?

Mr. COVINGTON. I do not think it is the only jurisdictional section of the bill. I think it is only jurisdictional in so far as fixing the requirements of the corporations in filing reports.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Is it not by virtue of this section that every corporation is subjected to making these reports and the exposition of their personal affairs?

Mr. COVINGTON. It is by virtue of this section that the jurisdictional rights of the commission to require reports exist; but the jurisdictional rights of the commission to investigate and to perform other duties are found in the sections defining those duties and providing for those investigations.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Would not my amendment merely operate to prevent such a thing as that in the case of a corporation of less than $5,000,000, unless the commission itself finds that such a corporation is doing something to restrain trade or create a monopoly?

Mr. COVINGTON. I think not. Your amendment would simply prevent the commission from requiring reports from corporations with less than $5,000,000 capital, unless they had been investigated to determine whether or not they were violating the antitrust laws. But what was intended in this section was to obviate the investigation of small corporations not charged with violations of law, because it might be an unjust oppression, and therefore the commission was given the power to classify those corporations, presumably by businesses, which the general information already in the hands of the commission demonstrated might possibly be so engaged as to require publicity of their acts in the interest of competition and to prevent monopoly. It is to avoid a preliminary investigation that we invest the commission with this power to designate the classes that shall file reports.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That when in the course of any investigation made under this act the commission shall obtain information concerning any unfair competition or practice in commerce not necessarily constituting a violation of law by the corporation investigated, it shall make report thereof to the President, to aid him in making recommendations to Congress for legislation in relation to the regulation of commerce, and the information so obtained and the report thereof shall be made public by the commission.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 11, page 9, by striking out all of said section and inserting the following:

"SEC. 11. That unfair or oppressive competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

"The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations engaged in commerce from using unfair or oppressive methods of competition.

"That whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation engaged in commerce has been or is using any unfair or oppressive method of competition it shall issue and serve upon said corporation a written order at least 30 days in advance of the time set therein for hearing, directing said corporation to appear before the commission and show cause why an order shall not be issued by the commission restraining and prohibiting said corporation from using such method of competition, and if upon such hearing the commission shall find that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act it shall thereupon issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same. The commission may at any time modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any order issued by it under this act.

"That whenever the commission, after the issuance of such restraining order, shall find that said corporation has complied herewith the commission may petition the district court of the United States within any district where the method in question was used or where the said corporation is located or carries on business, praying said court to issue an injunction to enforce such order of the commission; and such court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction, and also in case of any violation of such injunction in the discretion of the court to issue an order restraining said corporation from engaging in commerce for such time as said court may order."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to this section or to this bill.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order——

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order that it is not germane to this section specially or germane to any of the provisions or purposes of the bill; and, so far as I could gather from listening to the reading of it, it proposes to confer upon the commission judicial powers, to give it the power to restrain in some way, by order, the doing of certain things, which power can not be conferred upon anyone except a judicial body.

Mr. ADAMSON. And it attempts to fix prices.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not undertake to say that, because I did not hear it. This is an amendment to section 11 of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I have moved to strike out section 11 and substitute this.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I have the first part of the amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 11, page 9, by striking out all of said section and inserting the following:

"SEC. 11. That unfair or oppressive competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

"The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations engaged in commerce from using unfair or oppressive methods of competition."

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not care to have the Clerk read any further. Of course, this is an amendment to section 11, because it is a substitute for that section and a substitute is nothing but an amendment. In order to take the place of section 11 the amendment must be germane to that particular part of the bill and to the section proposed to be stricken out and to the purposes of the bill. Now, the Chair will see that section 11 provides for making a report to the President and to Congress for the purposes stated in the section; but this substitute proposes that the commission created by this act shall have power to do that which Congress has not the power to confer upon it. Now, some parts of this substitute may be germane. Some parts of it may relate to this section; but it is all coupled together with power which Congress can not confer upon any body so created by it, and therefore subject to the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Is not the gentleman arguing a constitutional question instead of a point of order?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am undertaking to argue the question of order; and if in calling the attention of the Chair to the provisions of the substitute I point out that it clearly violates the Constitution I think it is a very proper thing to suggest to the Chair that we can not by a bill which proposes merely to create a commission to ascertain certain information and to report it, and whose duties are confined solely to investigation and the making of reports, confer upon that commission judicial powers—not simply ministerial powers, but powers which you would confer upon a court to restrain by an order—that such a proposition is not germane to this section nor germane to this bill.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, section 11 provides that the commission shall make reports to the President whenever they discover the existence of any unfair or oppressive methods of competition. The amendment which I offer concerns entirely unfair competition and oppressive methods in commerce, and, instead of making a report to somebody, directs the commission, under the power conferred in the amendment, to restrain and prevent that sort of unfair competition. If this amendment is not germane to this bill, then half the amendments which have been offered here to-day are not germane.

It is true that the Covington bill confers no actual power upon the commission, but that was a matter of the discretion of a majority of the committee. Does the gentleman claim that this committee had no authority to give an interstate trade commission any power, just because in its judgment it was unwise to do so? And is any Member prevented from offering an amendment here that will give this commission some power merely because the majority of the committee did not see fit to report such a provision? There were a dozen different trade-commission bills before our committee, which were discussed in hearing after hearing, and many of them went a great deal further in granting power to this commission than my amendment does.

The gentleman says this amendment can not be considered here, because Congress can not grant any such power to any commission. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken on his question of constitutional law. If he is correct, and Congress can not give an interstate trade commission power to enforce certain rules and laws laid down by Congress itself, then your whole Interstate Commerce Commission law is unconstitutional.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. This is a question of the delegation of power.

Mr. BARTLETT. No. The Interstate Commerce Commission goes to the court to secure the enforcement of its orders.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. If the gentleman had seen fit to listen to my amendment——

Mr. BARTLETT. I did listen to it.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. This amendment merely gives the commission power to make an order, just as the Interstate Commerce Commission makes an order, and then the commission must go to the court to get the order enforced. It is just exactly as constitutional as the interstate-commerce act. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the language of the interstate-commerce act:

All charges made for service rendered or to be rendered shall be just and reasonable.

And the commission is given power to make findings and enforce that general rule of law. On the next page it says, in section 3 of the interstate-commerce act:

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage.

Now, the language in my amendment is not one bit broader than that. I start out with the statement of law in exactly the same way that the interstate-commerce act starts out. The declaration in the amendment is that unfair and oppressive methods of competition are declared unlawful.

The commission is given authority, if it finds upon investigation such methods to exist, to issue an order to the corporation asking it to appear and show cause why an order should not issue restraining that particular kind of competition. It certainly is not unconstitutional to declare by law that oppressive competition is unlawful. That is one of the main objects of the Sherman antitrust law—to prevent unfair contracts in restraint of trade—and it has so been held by the Supreme Court. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not press his point of order on this amendment. It is certainly germane to the section, since it deals with the same subject matter that the section deals with. It is certainly germane to the bill, because it is defining the powers of the interstate trade commission.

I frankly say that I do not think the gentleman will save any time in doing it. I would like a little time to discuss the amendment, which is of tremendous importance. If we go forth to the country and tell them that we have created a great interstate trade commission, and then the general public finds that the trade commission has nothing but powers of investigation—that it is nothing but the Bureau of Corporations under another name; that it has no power to prevent unfair methods of competition—the result will be disappointing.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order before the Chair rules. I would like merely to point out to the Chair that the bill is a bill to create an interstate trade commission and define its powers and duties, and for other purposes. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire seems to be in order. It is to define the powers of the commission, and I think it is not open to the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia.

I want to point out to the Chairman that as he rules he will define the scope of the measure. If he upholds the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia it confines the measure within the limits of a purely investigating commission. If he overrules it he opens it up to larger powers.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that if the Chair rules that the amendment is in order, it entirely changes the scope of the bill. Is not the gentleman making the wrong argument to the Chair?

Mr. MURDOCK. No. What I meant was that it limits the scope of amendments that could be offered to it.

Mr. MANN. This amendment would entirely change the scope of the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. I mean the scope of the amendments.

Mr. GOOD. If amendments of this character are not in order at this point, will the gentleman from Kansas state what provision of the bill they would be in order to?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not see the point, as far as any particular section is concerned. The point I want to make is that as the Chair rules now he defines largely the character of the amendment that can be offered to the bill. As the bill stands, it provides for a commission, with powers enumerated, to investigate. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire gives it the power to prevent unfair trade practices subject to review by the courts.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand, the amendment comprises two sections in the bill introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS]. Mr. Chairman, replying to the suggestion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, I do not think the Democratic Party is to be held in power by exacting such extreme and unconstitutional legislation as this amendment seeks to do. The very suggestion that he makes, the suggestion that the gentleman from Kansas makes, that this amendment changes the bill from its original purpose, clearly shows that the amendment proposed changes the purpose of the bill, which is asserted to be harmless, and therefore makes it subject to a point of order.

The gentleman from New Hampshire says that the Democratic Party can not afford to go before the country with a commission bill like this merely for a commission to investigate and report the conditions of corporations engaged in interstate commerce. Mr. Chairman, it is known that this very rule which brings this bill up for consideration before this House, adopted as a Democratic policy in caucus, was for the consideration of this trade-commission bill; and then to follow it up with certain other bills in which the purposes are to make changes in the antitrust law which will protect legitimate business. This amendment which the gentleman from New Hampshire offers had better find a place, could find a place, as far as germaneness is concerned, in the bill to follow this one than to put it in where it is offered here.

As far as I am concerned, I have not yet arrived at that stage of belief that it is a part of the Democratic creed to fix prices for people engaged in interstate commerce or to go to the extreme of conferring judicial powers upon a mere commission—to give them authority to investigate and to restrain by arbitrary orders the business of a citizen engaged in interstate commerce who may justly claim that he is not violating the Sherman antitrust law, without submitting the case to the courts.

If the business of this country is to be destroyed, it ought to be done by the judgment of the court and not by the judgment of three men. Thank God, as long as that written instrument which regulates and controls us, Congress can not give judicial powers to any such commission as this bill proposes to create.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Georgia will read the amendment he will see that it does not touch fixing prices.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say that it did.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. He will see that it confers no judicial powers on the trade commission any more than judicial powers are conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Supreme Court says that they did undertake to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission judicial powers, but that Congress could not do it. It undertook to do it very much in the language of this amendment. This amendment entirely changes the character and scope and purpose of this bill, and it is virtually admitted both by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that it does. It certainly is not germane to this section. There is no part of the bill to which it is germane, and if I be the only Democrat in the House, or the only Democrat in the United States, who is opposed to it, Mr. Chairman, I intend to voice my opposition to any such proposition as this, and I am not ashamed of that. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, loving the teachings and the doctrines of the Democratic fathers, I am not now ready and willing to follow even a good Democrat into this maze of socialism, populism, and so-called progressivism.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that I have a lively suspicion that the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire will go upon this bill in the Senate. When the bill comes back from the Senate, will the gentleman from Georgia vote against it?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. Even if a Democratic caucus directs him to vote for it?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, a Democratic caucus can not compel me to vote for an amendment which I believe is against the Constitution of the United States, as I believe this to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire is to section 11 of the bill. That section merely directs the commission to make a report of certain of its findings to the President. The amendment proposed by the gentleman to the section, and which, of course, is not offered as a separate section to the bill, embraces a number of substantive propositions, which, under the decisions relating to germaneness, would not bring it within the rule. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma offers as a substitute for section 11, on page 9, the following:

"SEC. 11. That when in the course of any investigation, or through any other reliable source, the commission shall obtain information that any corporation subject to the provisions of section 9 of this act, in conducting its business, is using any unfair competition or practice, the said corporation shall be cited to appear before said commission and a hearing shall be had thereon. If the commission shall find that the said corporation is or has been engaged in unfair competition or practices, it shall make an order commanding the said corporation to cease engaging in said unfair competition or practice, and any violation of said order by said corporation shall constitute a misdemeanor, for which offense it may be punished by a fine of not to exceed $5,000."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to that on the same ground on which the other went out, and also upon the ground that most of it is a repetition of what we voted down.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman is heard I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15613 and other bills, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16508. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 12806. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HILL, for 10 days.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the interstate trade commission bill and other bills.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15613 and other bills, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the ruling on the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS], I believe, is not a precedent as against the amendment which I have offered. Section 11 provides that when in the course of any investigation made under the act the commission shall obtain information concerning any unfair competition of practice, and so forth, and the fore part of the amendment which I have offered is in the exact language almost of the bill. Section 11 in the bill goes on, then, to say what the commission shall do—that it shall report such facts to the President to aid him in making recommendations to Congress for legislation in relation to the regulation of commerce, and the information so obtained and report thereof shall be made public by the commission. The Chair will observe that the only way in which I change that provision in this bill is by directing the commission to do another thing instead of reporting to the President. The amendment which I offer directs the commission to cite the corporation to appear, and gives the commission the authority to make an order, but does not give the commission authority, or attempt to give the commission authority, to enforce that order—absolutely no power. The only effect of that finding would be the moral effect, which is right in line with the language of this section in the bill, because the moral effect, so to speak, of reporting to the President, that he might recommend to Congress for legislation, would be of exactly the same character of procedure. The only thing is that I think it better by the terms of my amendment to let the commission make a finding, but not give the commission power to enforce that, and then I provide that a person who shall offend by repeating that practice shall be subject to fine. The bill contains several provisions making it an offense for corporations to refuse to make reports, and so forth, so that the latter part of this amendment is not objectionable, because the bill contains many provisions, or several, at least, where a corporation may be fined for offending any provision of the bill. I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order made against the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that under a long line of precedents relating to the question of germaneness the amendment of the gentleman offered to section 11 is subject to the point of order made against it, and is constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will offer this amendment as a new section to follow section 11.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order against that as not germane. It changes the entire character of the bill. This bill proposes a scheme to establish a tribunal to make investigations and report with a view to aiding in the enactment of certain legislation and the enforcement of law, and the gentleman proposes to change this into an entirely different tribunal, which will pass arbitrary judgment without any rule or guide, and sign orders as to things it considers unfair and improper and punish if people fail to observe the orders. It takes a tribunal established for one purpose, clearly depicted throughout the whole course of the bill, and transforms it into an entirely different tribunal for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman contend that any amendment which gives the commission additional power would not be germane to any section of the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. These gentlemen who call themselves progressives—and it has got to be a sort of watchword or password or byword, or something, I do not know what it is; shibboleth, I suppose—just say "progressive," and they all jump up and shout "hello," "hurrah," and "hallelujah"; and every one of them, instead of progressing, is going back to the old days of absolutism, regardless of law, reason, or constitutional limitation. As I understand, they want absolute power fixed in the commission that will delegate legislative power, judicial power, executive power—even including the pardoning power—and that without due notice, process of law, or anything else. There is no sense in that, as the gentleman has asked the question, aside from the fact it is out of order. There is no legislative rule laid down, as in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, within which it could act if we gave it power of action. It would be absolutely void, as the gentleman asks the question, if we put it in that way; but the point of order on the gentleman's amendment is that it changes the entire character of the commission. We establish an instrumentality for the purpose of investigating to help administer the law. The gentleman proposes to confuse this establishment of this instrumentality either by implication or by the enactment, indirect or by implication, of a system of laws. We may go forward in future time to pass laws for this commission to help administer, but that is an entirely different thing; but when you adopt this amendment which the gentleman proposes you have got to imply that there is a law already enacted to guide it in its judgment and in the enforcement of its orders. This entirely changes the whole character of the commission as instituted. We propose that it shall make investigation and report; the gentleman proposes that it sit in judgment without any guiding law, rule, or reason, and pass an order that men shall go to jail if they do not observe that arbitrary order.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that an amendment offered as an additional section shall be germane to the portion of the bill to which it is offered. Section 11 is a provision merely referring to clerical acts on the part of the commission. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is entirely of a different nature, and the Chair can not see that it will be germane to this portion of the bill, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer this amendment as an independent paragraph to be inserted at this point.

Mr. ADAMSON. It has just been offered as an independent section, and that is what the ruling of the Chair was on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to offer the amendment as a new section, and against which the gentleman from Georgia made the point of order; it perhaps by inadvertence was not reported, although it had been reported as an amendment to section 11.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I now offer it as an independent section to be added——

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what the gentleman did do, and I made a point of order against it, and the Chair sustained it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just ruled upon the question of the gentleman offering this amendment following section 11 as an independent section.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what the Chair ruled on.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. If the Chair will permit, I understood the Chair to hold that the amendment which I offered would not be germane or applicable to section 11.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the Chair's first ruling.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I did not understand the Chair to hold it would not be proper at any place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was merely making his first ruling on the question raised at the time, and on the last point of order he ruled on the question of the germaneness of that amendment offered as a separate section.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is so progressive that he has forgotten he offered that amendment first to the paragraph and then as an independent section.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have not made any observations upon this measure——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I will inquire if there are any other gentlemen who wish to speak on this section. I wish to reach an agreement.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would like to speak for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I would like to speak in opposition to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes; that gives 5 minutes to those Members who desire to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on section 11 and amendments thereto be closed in 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. And it is understood that Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota will control the time on that side and I will control the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, when I consider that this measure has been reported to the House in response to a universal demand from all over this country for the establishment of a real trade commission with some powers, and then when I read this bill, I do not know whether to laugh or to cry. It reminds me, Mr. Chairman, very much of the description of the administration tango, which I am told is one step forward, three steps back, hesitation, side step. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I want to read just a word from the Democratic platform of 1912.

Mr. SIMS. Why read it?

Mr. GOOD. I realize that it is hardly worth reading from any more, because it has been discredited at the White House, discredited in this House, discredited all over the country, and I realize the pertinency of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee when he asked the question, Why read from it? But I want to call the Democrats' attention to the things that they said in their platform:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade.

This is the platform declaration of the Democratic Party on this great trust question. You now propose this bill as a fulfillment of that pledge. How you thundered in your platform then; how you whisper in your performance now. The President has told you that business was disturbed and that real legislation would aggravate that disturbance. The President has harkened to big business, has turned a deaf ear to the earnest appeals of the public, and has told you to bear on the soft pedal, and you have obeyed his commands. And this worthless bill is the result.

Why, the great Democratic Party in its platform favored a declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall engage in interstate trade, and yet when the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] offers an amendment providing those conditions, the Chairman rules that it is not lawful to offer an amendment to this bill, in response to that platform—the Stevens amendment that would give at least one tooth to this toothless bill. There is not in this bill a single command to the trade commission. You provide that the commission may do certain things, but where do you provide that they shall do a single thing? You will look in vain for such a provision in the bill; it is not there.

Oh, gentlemen, you misunderstand the temper of the American people when you try to trifle with their convictions in this way. Why do you not bring out a bill that means something, and that will give a commission some power to do something? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] the other day well said that if this bill becomes a law it would be one from which you could never take anything away. No; there is nothing here to take anything from in the way of power.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield? I know the gentleman does not mean to misinterpret me in any way, but if I made any such remark as that it was not in line with the thought now in the gentleman's mind.

Mr. GOOD. I do not intend to misrepresent the gentleman in any respect. But the bill was so susceptible of that interpretation, and, together with the gentleman's speech, I thought that was what he meant.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I had no intention of using any such words. I have not gone carefully over the report of my remarks.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman might have modified that statement. There is one bad provision in this bill, in my opinion, and one that will some time be removed, and that is the provision that gives this little, almost powerless commission the power to grant immunities to all the officers of corporations throughout this country that have been violating the laws of the United States. In your platform you said:

> We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust, and its failure to invoke the criminal provisions of the antitrust law against the officers of those corporation.

In response to the demand of this administration the Democratic Party now proposes to pass a law giving authority to a commission to grant immunity to the officers of the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco and other trusts. This is about the only real power conferred upon this commission.

In conclusion, I wish to say that during my experience in this House I do not recall where a great committee, which contains in its membership so many great men and lawyers, has brought out a bill so meaningless, so worthless, so unresponsive to the demands of the American people as the bill now before this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make about the trade-commision bill and unfair competition. I was shut out from offering my amendment, and I want to get them in under this pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that the trust question and the regulation of big business by the Federal Government is a very difficult, a very complicated subject, and that it is the duty of Congress to approach it in one way conservatively, with care, and with a great deal of thought. It is true we need to know a great deal more about big business than we know to-day. It is true we need to have a commission which may get for us full and accurate information about all the big business corporations that now control our interstate commerce. But we are not entirely ignorant on this subject. While there is a great deal to know, there is a great deal that we do know. We have had investigations by a Bureau of Corporations for 10 years; we have had litigation before the Supreme Court by the Department of Justice for 25 years, and there are some things we know about big corporations and monopolies and the means by which they grow to great power and the means by which they do injury to the people and to the independent manufacturers and business men. The investigations, the cases in the Supreme Court, have established certain facts which justify at this time the giving to this commission some power over the practices of the big corporations engaged in interstate commerce. If the gentleman will take the pains to read the testimony in the Standard Oil case or in the Tobacco case, he will discover that the chief source of power, the chief means by which these two great corporations acquired a monopoly to the great injury of the American people and to the great injury of the independent business man, was through the use of unfair, oppressive, and illegal methods of competition. And let me tell the gentlemen in the oil business and in the tobacco business to-day, in spite of the decrees of the Supreme Court, those same practices are going on to-day.

The Supreme Court is not a proper body to regulate trade practices. It neither has the information, the time, nor the training. And if we intend to regulate the practices of corporations engaged in interstate commerce we can do so only in two ways. We can follow the suggestions of the Clayton bill, attempting to define by a technical definition certain particular acts and declare them to be crimes and misdemeanors, and wait for the Department of Justice to enforce the law. I do not wish to criticize the Judiciary Committee, but I think the members who have worked on the first four sections, which undertake to define certain trade practices and make them misdemeanors, realize even better than I do the tremendous difficulties of any such task. Those sections of the Clayton bill as they stand to-day, after months and months of work by capable lawyers, hit things that you do not want to hit and let things go that you do not want to let go.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I have only five minutes.

I want to point out that the criminal court, even in dealing with simple cases of assaults and violations to persons and property, is the most ineffective branch of our judicial procedure to-day, so much so that President Taft declared that our criminal law has become a disgrace to our civilization. The criminal courts are absolutely ineffective to deal with complicated modern business conditions. That has been proved by the history of the attempts of the Department of Justice to enforce the criminal sections of the Sherman antitrust law. In the case of the great corporation, with complicated organization and with divided responsibility, it is difficult to place responsibility for any particular act. Juries will not convict. While we have had case after case where the Supreme Court has declared that corporations have violated the Sherman antitrust law, there has not been one malefactor of great wealth in jail as a result of it, and the law has been on the statute books for 25 years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, section 11 reads as follows:

> SEC. 11. That when in the course of any investigation made under this act the commission shall obtain information concerning any unfair competition or practice in commerce not necessarily constituting a violation of law by the corporation investigated it shall make report thereof to the President, to aid him in making recommendations to Congress for legislation in relation to the regulation of commerce, and the information so obtained and the report thereof shall be made public by the commission.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my criticism of that section is that the whole section is simply an arrangement to postpone any effective action. In a way that is one criticism I have against the entire bill. It is for the purpose of investigation, of getting information. We have been getting information for a quarter of a century. We know the condition of the industrial affairs of this country. We are familiar with the unfair practices in business. We know largely the conditions so far as there is an absence of competition and so far as monopolistic conditions exist. Now, then, after we get this information they will report it to the President, whoever he may be. Probably before they report anything we will have another President, and then that President may act on that information and report to Congress or not. But it will probably be two or three years before the President will furnish Congress the information.

Then Congress will have that matter referred to a committee. We must have another hearing and another investigation, and finally we get a bill before this House, and then it must run the gantlet, and the probabilities are that, so far as the provisions of this section are concerned, it would be absolutely 10 years before we would ever enact a statute based upon information that would be reported under that section of this bill.

The time has come for action. We have the information. We have gone through a period of agitation. We have promised the people action. The people are ready, and the way is clear, if we will only look upon those things in the right light and from the right direction. It is not a matter of being a Progressive or a Democrat or a Republican, but it is a matter of being able under the present conditions to seize the opportunity, to understand the situation, and to enact such laws as will be effective, to satisfy the people and satisfy the country, and let business go on.

My friends, this bill provides that some 1,300 corporations shall make annual reports. What good will reports do? What good does information do? What will that accomplish? We embarrass the business interests by taking the arm of the Federal Government and compelling them to go into details and report the nature and character of their business and pile up that information here among the printed archives of the Nation, and nothing is accomplished.

So my appeal here is that we broaden the purposes of this bill; that we extend the power that is given to the commission; that we do something that will tend to allay the unrest among the people and satisfy the people of this Nation that Congress is true to their interests; that while we have no desire to injure or embarrass the business interests of this country, and while we desire in the interest of the people that our business shall prosper and go on ever extending and expanding in its greatness, yet we want it to go along lines that are consistent with the rights of the people, with the public interests, and with the greatness and glory of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, let the Clerk read. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That in any suit in equity brought by or under the direction of the Attorney General as provided in the antitrust acts, the court may, upon the conclusion of the testimony therein, if it shall be then of opinion that the complainant is entitled to relief, refer said suit to the commission to ascertain and report an appropriate form of decree therein——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, in order to get the floor must I wait until the section is read?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; until the section is read. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued to read, as follows:

and upon the coming in of such report such exceptions may be filed and such proceedings had in relation thereto as upon the report of a master in other equity causes, but the court may adopt or reject such report, in whole or in part, and enter such decree as the nature of the case may in its judgment require.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DONOVAN. This being, Mr. Chairman, one of the most important measures that is to come before this Congress, I wish to call attention to the fact that from the great State of Illinois all Members have absented themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I see a gentleman from Illinois right out there in the lobby.

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that all Members from the great State of Illinois have absented themselves from this Hall. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is in error. Here is a gentleman from Illinois, and there is another gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman can not interrupt me except by asking through the Chair permission to submit a question. I again repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of the great measures coming before Congress, and yet leaders on the other side, and would-be leaders and leaders to be, have abandoned this measure, and especially so the great leader of the State of Illinois. [Laughter.]

I withdraw the pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma moves to amend by adding a new section to follow section 12, on page 10, to be numbered section 12a, as follows:

"SEC. 12a. That every practice, method, means, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance used by any corporation subject to the provisions of section 9 of this act in conducting its business, or in the management, control, regulation, promotion, or extension thereof, shall be just, fair, and reasonable and not contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and every corporation subject to the provisions of section 9 of this act in the conduct of its business is hereby prohibited from engaging in any practice, or from using any means, method, or system, or from pursuing any policy, or from resorting to any device, scheme, or contrivance whatsoever that is unjust, unfair, or unreasonable, or that is contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and every act or thing in this section prohibited is hereby declared to be unlawful."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane. It is not germane to that section or to any other part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to be heard?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, this bill is entitled "A bill to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes." That gives the purpose of the bill a very wide scope, and, in fact, you could properly offer any amendment under that title of the bill.

Now, there are a number of sections here, and you will notice that this proposed section applies only to corporations which are included within section 9 of the bill. Section 9 of the bill provides that corporations shall do certain things. Now, then, is it not germane to these provisions to say that they shall do other things? It certainly should be. If it is not germane to lay down other rules for these corporations, to say what other things they shall do—if not, then it seems to me there is no use in going through the farce, if you will excuse that term, of offering amendments, because nothing would be germane.

Now, section 9 of the bill puts certain corporations——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, that has no application to section 9 of the bill, or section 11, or section 12. It has no application to any of them.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. This is not an amendment to section 9.

Mr. ADAMSON. You put it in as "section 12a."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I offer it as "section 12a." Now, if you can require under section 9 that certain corporations——

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. COVINGTON. Is not that substantially the same amendment which was originally offered as an amendment to section 9?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I have offered no amendment to section 9.

Mr. COVINGTON. Is not this practically the same amendment that has been once or twice offered prior to this time?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Not that I know of. I think not.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is substantially the same.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. It is very similar.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is offered as a new section, following section 9?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. This is offered as "section 12a."

Mr. BARTLETT. Is not this a new addition to section 9?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No. I was not here when that was considered.

Mr. COVINGTON. There was offered practically that same proposition, conferring definite administrative powers on the proposed commission, and the Chair ruled that that amendment was not germane to this bill. Now, the phraseology of the present amendment, while slightly different, practically seeks to do the same thing.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I think, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not read this amendment. This provision does not give that commission any power. It simply says that—

Every practice, method, means, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance used by any corporation subject to the provisions of section 9 of this act shall be just, fair, and reasonable.

This amendment does not give a particle of power to the commission. It simply lays down a general rule that shall apply to these corporations that you include in section 9, and nothing else.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. As I understand, the gentleman's amendment does not have anything to do, so far as the powers of the commission created by this bill are concerned, but it only puts the corporation under certain restrictions and limitations that are not now included in this bill.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That are not now included in section 9 of the bill; yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Therefore it is legislation upon the same subject, germane to the question that is being considered, and the only question is, Is it extending the powers of the law?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.
Mr. CULLOP. Putting some teeth into it.
Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.
Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.
Mr. ADAMSON. Is not this the effect of it, that it does something of an entirely different character than what is done in section 9, and puts teeth into an animal that does not use teeth?
Mr. MURDOCK. There is no question about putting teeth into it.
Mr. ADAMSON. This animal was not made to have that kind of teeth.
The CHAIRMAN. Section 9 provides for the making of annual reports. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] as a new section, to be known as section 12a, provides a different method of management of corporations, which the Chair does not believe would be germane, especially to this part of the bill. So the Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, to be known as section 12a.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding a new section on page 10 to follow section 12, and to be numbered 12a, as follows:
"SEC. 12a. That every corporation subject to the provisions of section 9 of this act shall deal justly and fairly with competitors and the public, and it shall be unlawful for any such corporation to grant to any person or persons any special privilege or advantage which shall be unjust and unfair to others, or unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or to enter into any special contract, agreement, or arrangement with any person or persons which shall be unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or which shall give to such person or persons an unfair and unjust advantage over others, or that shall give to the people of any locality or section of the country any unfair, unjust, or unreasonable advantage over the people of any other locality or section of the country, or that shall be contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and any and all the acts or things in this section declared to be unlawful are hereby prohibited."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is covered by the ruling just made by the Chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this is covered by the previous ruling. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to inquire if anybody else desires to debate this question. If not, let the gentleman proceed.
Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, my idea is that there ought to be some general statute prescribing in general terms what is unjust discrimination. It is impossible to prohibit all the acts specifically. We can only prohibit a few. For instance, in the so-called Clayton bill, which comes from the Committee on the Judiciary after three or four months of hard work and investigation, there are four or five things prohibited. Even there we enter upon a dangerous course, because there is always danger when you undertake to prohibit things in bills.
In criminal matters relating to individuals we prohibit the doing of certain things, and we have a long list of crimes and of things which are prohibited. As a rule, our criminal laws only prohibit things which are immoral; but when we come to prohibit things which are involved in business transactions, when we come by prohibition to make crimes of certain things which are done in business, in commerce, in trade, we are entering not only upon a difficult but a dangerous field, dangerous to business, and very difficult to carry out without doing more injury than good. But if we enact a general statute, then the courts or the commission may enforce that general statute, and all kinds of discrimination will be included. Take the interstate-commerce act. In the very first act, when we created the Interstate Commerce Commission, there were a few things, such as rebates, that were prohibited; but there was a general clause in that bill that defined all kinds of unjust discrimination and prohibited them; and it is under that general clause that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been given power to regulate, to reach out, to meet conditions, to reach certain specific acts or practices that have grown up from time to time. So I think it is very important that we enter upon the same kind of legislation, and that we have a general statute. Indeed, the Sherman act is a model of legislation in general terms, a model of generalities, so to speak. I think this section which I have presented, being general in its terms, would include not only those things which we now recognize as unjust discriminations, but would apply to others arising in the future. And while no doubt the language might be improved, yet something along that line ought to be done. I believe the Hon. Seth Low and a number of other gentlemen, among the most eminent in this country, appeared before our committee and insisted that we ought to have this kind of legislation.
Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, let the Clerk read.
The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That wherever a final decree has been entered against any defendant corporation in any suit brought by the United States to prevent and restrain any violation of the antitrust acts, the commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, upon its own initiative or upon the application of the Attorney General, to make investigation of the manner in which the decree has been or is being carried out. It shall transmit to the Attorney General a report embodying its findings as a result of any such investigation, and the report shall be made public in the discretion of the commission.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to what I think is an unfortunate use of the word "wherever" in the first line. Certainly that is not what is intended. The adverb of place is not appropriate in that connection. I suggest that what ought to be done is to strike out the word "wherever" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in any case wherein," so that it will read: "That in any case wherein a final decree has been entered." It is useless for us to offer amendments, because they are voted down; but I hope the committee will see the appropriateness of adopting that suggestion.
I would like also to call the attention of the committee to the use of the word "any" in this section, in line 3, on page 11. That is an unfortunate use of the word; either it should be "every" or the word should be omitted altogether. It means "every such investigation" if it means anything.
The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.
There was no objection.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That any person who shall willfully make any false entry or statement in any report required to be made under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000, or to imprisonment for not more than three years, or both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 10, after the word "both," insert the word "such."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is unnecessary to call attention of the committee to the appropriateness of the insertion of this word. Of course it does not mean to leave the power of fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court, but it means that the court may, if it thinks best, inflict fine and imprisonment within the limits previously stated as it might deem proper.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.
The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That any officer or employee of the commission who shall make public any information obtained by the commission without its authority, or as directed by a court, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 18, after the word "by," insert the words "both such."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That for the purposes of this act, and in aid of its powers of investigation herein granted, the commission shall have and exercise the same powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission in the acts to regulate commerce to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence and to administer oaths. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said acts to regulate commerce and by the act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved February 11, 1893, and the act defining immunity, approved June 13, 1906, shall apply to witnesses, testimony, and documentary evidence before the commission.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 7, strike out "thirteenth" and insert "thirtieth."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of calling the committee's attention to a little newspaper statement published in the Washington Times.
Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to know if there are any other amendments to this paragraph?

Mr. GOOD. I have an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Oklahoma wants to offer an amendment as a new section. I suppose that would be to this paragraph.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to an article that was published in the Washington Times day before yesterday. It is headed "Want more teeth in Wilson antitrust bills."

I will read it for the enlightenment of the committee, and especially for the gentleman having charge of this bill:

WANT MORE "TEETH" IN WILSON ANTITRUST BILLS.

Efforts were made to-day by Congressman STEVENS of New Hampshire and Louis D. Brandeis, former counsel to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to persuade President Wilson to permit more "teeth" to be placed in the administration antitrust bills. The callers presented their views to the President and urged him to consent to amendments to the bills after they have reached the Senate.

The President did not commit himself. It is not thought likely he will permit any changes at this time.

During the debate on this bill in the House there have been many amendments presented, some of them substantive, some of them merely to correct the text of the bill, and some to correct both grammatical and other errors; but the committee would not allow a single one of these amendments to be adopted. They have all been voted down by the committee having charge of this bill. Now, we know the reason. It is not the House of Representatives that is legislating; it is the President of the United States, who says that these bills must not be changed from the form in which they have received his approval. These gentlemen sit here and pretend to legislate for the people, pretend to represent their constituencies, pretend to act upon the merits of the case; but they are merely recording the declared instructions of the President of the United States in regard to these trust bills. What a farce it is to call it by the name of legislation. These gentlemen are not doing what they want to do. They are intelligent men; they are not doing what they think best, although their judgment is good. They would be perfectly willing to accept amendments that appeal to their reason if they dared; but evidently they do not dare to do so. They are here under instructions. This bill, and I presume the other bills, are to be forced through under whip and spur, just as they have been written, and then sent to the Senate, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether the President will allow any amendments to be made there. This is not legislating for the people. It is no wonder that there are no teeth in this bill. It is no wonder that they are not to be considered on their merits. Evidently the President has determined that he will not allow the great interests of this country to even think they will be injured in any possible way by his trust bills. The trust bills are not even to scare any of the great industries of the country. The President now evidently intends to conciliate them. So, Mr. Chairman, we have been going through the farce of a pretended consideration of this bill and not a real one. I presume we will go through the farce of a pretended consideration of the other bills. But the result is all determined—all declared. These gentlemen have received their instructions and obediently they will obey.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The debate has been fixed for a certain time, and the gentleman from Maryland is not included.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have five minutes, which I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Connecticut that the debate was limited to 20 minutes, 15 minutes to be occupied by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I will surrender the floor and wait until these gentlemen finish.

Mr. DONOVAN. But the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has the other five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. ADAMSON. As soon as the gentleman from Oklahoma concludes I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma moves to amend by adding a new section on page 12, to follow section 16, and to be numbered section 16A, as follows:

"SEC. 16a. That when the commission, through any investigation it may make, reports it may receive, or from any other trustworthy source shall obtain reliable information that any corporation subject to the provisions of section 9 of this act, by reason of the nature or extent of its business, or from any other reason or cause, has become a virtual monopoly, or is able to control arbitrarily the prices of its products, the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to cite such corporation to appear before it for a hearing thereon. If after full hearing thereon the commission shall find that the said corporation is a virtual monopoly or that said corporation is able to control arbitrarily the prices of its products, the said corporation shall thereafter be subject to the control of the commission as to its practices in conducting its business and as to the prices of its products, to the same extent and in like manner that common carriers are subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission: Provided, That after any such finding shall be made by the commission with reference to any corporation the prices at which such corporation shall sell its products shall be just and reasonable and its practices in business shall be just and fair and not unreasonably discriminatory against any competitor, person, or locality."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that, that it is obnoxious to every objection that has been covered by every ruling that has been made by the Chair in the last two hours.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I suppose I may have my five minutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to the gentleman having five minutes, but I make the point of order. I have no objection, if the gentleman is offering that as a part of his speech, but if he wants it voted upon, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not care for that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. I desire to move to strike out section 16, and before I obtain the floor to do that the gentleman from Oklahoma has offered an amendment in the nature of a new section, to come in at the conclusion of section 16. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the consideration of this new paragraph at this time would preclude my offering the amendment. If so, I desire to offer a preferential motion.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have an agreement by unanimous consent to close debate on this section and all amendments thereto in 20 minutes. The gentleman can offer amendments, of course, if he can get the floor; but the gentleman from Oklahoma has offered an amendment and I have made a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care when my motion is offered; I only desire that I should not be cut out of the right to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HULL). The amendment which the gentleman from Iowa suggests would be in order under the unanimous-consent agreement, as the Chair is advised.

Mr. ADAMSON. He can offer it. I do not know whether it will be in order.

Mr. DONOVAN. But he has no time in which he will have the opportunity to speak to it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, yes; five minutes were reserved to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there is a point of order pending against the motion to amend made by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma being offered as a new section, would upon that ground not be in order pending the carrying out of the unanimous-consent agreement with respect to this section.

Mr. ADAMSON. But, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the ground that it is not germane to this part of the bill or any other part of the bill; that it changes the entire character of the bill itself. The amendment proposes to confer upon this commission arbitrary powers unauthorized by law and contrary to the purpose of the bill, changing its character entirely. I object to it because it is not germane to this part of the bill or any other part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. For the present the Chair sustains the point of order upon the ground which is stated, and recognizes the gentleman from Iowa to offer his amendment.

Mr. DONOVAN. But the gentleman from Oklahoma has five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. He can have his five minutes. When he got the floor he offered his amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the reporter's notes will show that unanimous consent was had that there be 20 minutes of debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. I do not think that could possibly cut the gentleman out of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not the intention of the Chair to eliminate the gentleman from Oklahoma except in respect to offering a new section to the bill at this time.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman took the floor and offered his amendment, and when he offered it I made the point of order against it on all the grounds that I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair sustains the point of order upon the grounds stated by the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But the gentleman has not been recognized for his five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is about to recognize the gentleman from Oklahoma. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, there was so much confusion that I do not think very many understood the contents of this proposed new section. It provides, in substance, that when this commission on investigation or through any other source shall have information that a certain corporation is a virtual monopoly, or has the power through the extent of its business or otherwise to arbitrarily control the prices of its products, that that corporation shall be cited to appear before the commission in order that there shall be a hearing, and if the commission shall so find then thereafter the corporation in the sale of its products shall sell them at reasonable prices. It will be noticed that it applies only to corporations which have been investigated, which have had a hearing, and where there has been a finding that they are virtual monopolies, or that they possess power to arbitrarily control the prices, and in that case the law comes in and gives this commission authority to control those prices, the same as the Interstate Commerce Commission has to control the charges of transportation companies.

I know it is considered very radical to undertake to control in any manner the prices of the products of private corporations, and yet when we enacted the Sherman antitrust law the object of that law was to control prices, not directly, but indirectly, because the object of that law is to maintain competition; and every syllable of this bill, the purpose of every investigation, the purpose of every antitrust enactment, is indirect control of prices. In respect to public utility companies and common carriers, in the last quarter of a century we have moved along until it is conceded generally that their prices must be controlled, and why? Because they are monopolies to a certain extent.

Now, then, if it is proper to control the prices of the public utility companies and carrier companies on the ground that they are monopolies, why is it not also proper that when we find, through some proper proceedings, that corporations like the Standard Oil Co. or other large corporations have the power to control prices at which their products are sold, then why should not we, by the same logic and for the same purpose of protecting the people and the public, why should not the National Government step in and control prices? Now, I have here an address delivered by Theodore Roosevelt on February 21, 1912. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is absent, but I presume he will consent to my quoting from Col. Roosevelt——

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman have to get his consent?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Col. Roosevelt says:

> Where regulation by competition (which is, of course, preferable) proves insufficient, we should not shrink from bringing governmental regulations to the point of control of monopoly prices, if it should ever become necessary to do so, just as in exceptional cases railway rates are now regulated.

I hold here the decision referred to by my colleague [Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma] in the German Alliance Insurance Co. case, rendered in the Supreme Court. Before this decision was rendered insurance companies were regarded as private business, private corporations. The State of Kansas gave the insurance commissioner the power to fix the rates of insurance companies if they were unreasonable. The case went finally to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court holds that while insurance companies are private business, they have become so impressed with a public use, they have become of such public consequence, that it is within the power of the State to fix their charges. Now, then, the power of the State, of course, comes from a different source from the power of the National Government.

The State acts through its police power. Congress acts through the clause of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign countries, or under the public-welfare clause. But the police power of the State is broad enough to include the power to legislate when necessary to protect the public welfare. So the Federal Government unquestionably has the power to regulate the prices and charges as well as the practices of industrial corporations which have by the nature and character of their business become so impressed with a public use that they have become of public consequence.

There was a time when the railways engaged in interstate commerce denied the right of the National Government to control their practices and charges. They resisted to the last every attempt of the National Government to exercise any control over them; but they had to surrender. Public-utility companies denied the right of the State to control their practices or charges. They did not willingly submit to control; they fought to the last; but the courts of highest authority sustained the statutes giving commissions the power to regulate their rates and charges.

Now, we have industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce possessed with the same monopolistic power. They are artificial persons—corporations existing by virtue of the law. It is through public law that such corporations have existence and in corporate form are permitted to do business. We have the same right, the same power, and there is the same public demand that we control the practices and prices of industrial corporations that possess arbitrary power to control prices that there is to control the practices and charges of public-utility companies and transportation corporations. But my proposition would affect no corporations except those which, after a full hearing, have been found to possess the power to arbitrarily fix the prices of their products. I believe I have presented a practicable remedy—a procedure that may be pursued in an orderly way. Why not take one step in advance, and adopt a method that in a measure would protect the people from being compelled to pay any unjust tribute to our gigantic business corporations?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 16, commencing line 20, page 11, and ending line 9, page 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend by striking out all of section 16, on pages 11 and 12.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph is the one that authorizes the commission to compel the production of books and papers and testimony, and then contains this provision, which it must contain in order to make it a constitutional provision:

> All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said acts to regulate commerce and by the act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved February 11, 1893, and the act defining immunity, approved June 13, 1906, shall apply to witnesses, testimony, and documentary evidence before the commission.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to granting to any man or to any commission the power to grant immunities to wrongdoers. That power was rightly lodged with the Attorney General of the United States, and it should not be lodged with the numerous commissions that Congress might from time to time authorize. A part of the act of February 11, 1893, is as follows:

> But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said commission or in obedience to its subpœna or the subpœna of either of them, or in any such proceedings.

Take the case that is now before the public mind. The newspapers report that Mr. Mellen, the president of the New Haven & Hartford road, went to the Attorney General and stated that he was willing to confess to all the sins that have been committed by the officers of that great corporation—and we all know they have committed many of them—if he would be granted immunity from prosecution.

The Attorney General advised him that he had enough evidence to send him to the penitentiary. Mr. Mellen then in his desire for this immunity went to Mr. Folk, counsel for the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that gentleman, who always wants to be in the limelight and occupy the headlines, granted the immunity and received the testimony. Some people think the great Interstate Commerce Commission should not be clothed with this great power. Think of what we are doing now by enacting section 16. We grant to this little trade commission the power to grant immunity to the officers of the Standard Oil Co., to the officers of the Tobacco Trust, to the officers of every trust throughout the length and breadth of this land, no matter how many times they have violated the law, if they will simply come to the commission and give testimony. If they come before the commission and give testimony, then they are immune from prosecution and from the payment of any fine, penalty, or anything of that kind. Seriously, gentlemen, and we ought to act seriously on this bill, notwithstanding the fact that men on both sides of the House have been laughing about it. We all know that it is not responsive to a public sentiment of the people. Down deep in their hearts Members know they do not mean anything by passing this bill; that it will never become a law. Yet while you are fooling the public you ought not to write in the statutes of this country a provision that is going to give an immunity bath to all wrongdoers—and there are lots of them. What would happen if this provision were left out? Men would come before that commission, and if they refused to testify the commission could not make them testify; but the commission could go to the Attorney General of the United States and say, "This person, who is an officer of this or that corporation, we believe is a wrongdoer. He has refused to testify, and we believe that by his testimony he would incriminate himself, and we can not grant immunity." Then the Attorney General of the United States with the great arm of justice could reach out and prosecute such men and send them where they belong. While this bill is meaningless in many respects, I ask you not to write into the laws of the United States immunity for all the officers of the great trusts and combinations of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland what time remains in my control.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] read an extract from the Washington Times regarding a visit of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS], Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, and two other gentlemen to the President to suggest amendments to the pending bill. He reads that they left with little encouragement from the President, and he states that he presumes that, at the instance and dictation of the President, this House has abdicated its powers of legislation, and for that reason the membership of this House will put through this bill in the form in which it is originally reported to the Committee of the Whole. I recall that the gentleman from Iowa, when he spoke some little time ago upon this measure, stated that he expected to vote for it. I wish to ask him whether as a Republican he is accepting dictation from President Wilson and therefore expects to vote for this bill exactly as it was reported. I argue that a Republican may well accept dictation from the President. It will be for the benefit of his public service, but he ought to admit it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I can not yield now.

Mr. TOWNER. Will you allow me to answer your question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] declines to yield.

Mr. COVINGTON. Now, it so happened that I was chairman of the subcommittee which formulated this bill, and I say here solemnly there was no dictation by anybody in its framing. I take it that gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, including the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], and the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND], are not supporting this measure in the form in which it was originally produced by the subcommittee simply because a Democratic President in the White House is dictating to them. I certainly take it that after the course of the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] in leading his side on the toll-question fight no one will accuse him of yielding to the dictation of the President in support of this measure. But let me say a word more. The truth is that during the whole course of the formation of this piece of legislation I never received one word from the President of the United States which indicated that he had any pride of opinion in a single line or paragraph or page of this bill. He simply stated at times his general ideas regarding the legislation. It was his duty to do that, and I think it proper that he should have been consulted as the Executive of the Nation. However, when he stated any views to me they were freely communicated to my Republican associates upon the subcommittee, and this bill, whatever be its merits, is in the fullest sense the product of that subcommittee. As I stated in my opening remarks, we accepted freely and gladly the judgment and advice of experts who came before us and the advice of able lawyers that we heard, in order to perfect the bill and make it a strong and efficient measure. It is a piece of legislation produced in the normal way in which legislation ought to be produced, and it is not being put through this House at the dictatorial hands of an imperious President. And the fact is that President Wilson gets his results for the benefit of the people because he advises with and does not dictate to his coworkers in the legislative branch of this Government.

Mr. Chairman, one word more. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has referred to the immunity clause in section 16. It is a catchy phrase to say that you are granting immunity to criminals, and at first blush it seems to be an alluring criticism of this section, but that immunity is precisely what exists to-day with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The statute which originally created immunity was found to be one of necessity with that commission. I do not say that in the future we may not have to reorganize the entire system of legal control of the various bureaus of the Government of the United States, with the Attorney General, the head of the Department of Justice, in charge of the system. That may or may not be wise. But at this time, when we are not prepared to launch on a comprehensive reorganization of the system, and when the Interstate Commerce Commission has found that in nearly every case this immunity to subordinates, who are not real malefactors of great wealth, is the only means through which to get to the bedrock of corporate corruption in this country, I state to this House that the immunity provisions of this bill are a necessity for the interstate trade commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment is a motion to strike out the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that recognition now passes to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the special order of the House, the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, is now before the committee for its consideration. Under the further terms of the special order the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized for eight hours. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Chair notify me when I have used one hour.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party in their convention in 1912, among other things, declared in favor of supplemental legislation to the now existing antitrust laws, such as prevention of holding companies, interlocking directorates, discrimination in price, and so forth. The Judiciary Committee, in obedience to that plank in the platform, for the last four or five months have sat patiently and diligently in an effort to present to this House some bill which would carry out the reasonable demand found in that platform. It is proper to say, gentlemen, that the committee has dealt with this question faithfully, conscientiously, and studiously. For nearly four months the entire membership of that committee, or as many as could attend, sat and listened to witnesses from all parts of the United States on proposed or tentative bills. The subcommittee spent much time and great patience in trying to present a bill which would remedy the evils that are almost universally complained of and at the same time unfetter and unshackle legitimate business in the United States.

At least the majority of that committee feel that we have presented a bill which to a great extent does that very thing. The minority members of the committee are not satisfied among themselves about the provisions of the bill H. R. 15657, which is now under consideration. Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, Mr. DYER, and Mr. DANFORTH, if you will read their minority report, are very insistent that we have gone entirely too far; that we have put entirely too many teeth in this bill; that it is even radical; and that the Sherman antitrust law, as it now stands, is ample to root out all monopoly and destroy all unfair restraints of trade and trade practices. On the other hand,

Messrs. NELSON and VOLSTEAD say that it is a distinct disappointment in that we have not gone far enough; that it is a mild makeshift; that it has not teeth enough; that it is not radical at all; and that it is a sop thrown out to business. And still another minority report is filed by our good friend Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma, and he does not exactly agree with either one of the other factions of the minority, and it is understood by the majority of the committee, although he does not agree with the majority entirely or the minority or the minority of the minority, that he proposes to vote for this bill.

I say again, gentlemen, that the committee has labored patiently and honestly. And before I proceed to discuss the bill section by section, I want to be permitted to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], who a moment ago read an extract from the Washington Times, suggesting that the President had dictated and dominated the construction of this entire bill. I want to tell my friend that that is absolutely unfair and untrue. The President has never at any time suggested or demanded that no amendment should be added to this bill; he has never at any time suggested that this bill should be put through as it is presented here to-day.

He has acted as any other great Executive should act who is anxious about the good of his country, about the unshackling and protection of honest business, and about the restraint and punishment of unscrupulous business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If, as my friend insinuates, the President has so much arbitrary power with the Democratic Members of Congress, pray tell us why the most liberal rule ever presented by the House of Representatives on any bill is before you now? The President might well have gone further if he had been dictatorial, as my friend intimates, and asked the Committee on Rules to put this bill through just as it is written, and not to allow an amendment to be offered or considered.

Mr. GARNER. And still be in entire keeping with what the Republican Party had been doing for 16 years?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. Many a time have I sat here under Republican rule and seen bills passed where no one was allowed to even offer an amendment or vote for one. But we give you 16 hours of general debate, and after the general debate is over we give you unlimited time, both on the Republican and on the Democratic side, to debate every line and section of this bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARNER. And to offer any amendment which anyone wishes to offer?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. Any amendment can be offered and adopted if the House chooses. The President has not said that no amendment shall be offered or adopted to this bill. He has simply said that the general provisions of this bill meet his approval. But as to a hard-and-fast suggestion that he does not want the language of this bill added to or taken from, he has never uttered a syllable to any member of the committee who has seen him during the progress of the construction of this act to this effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having said that much, I am going to take it upon myself to give a running outline of the meaning and meat of each provision in this bill. I know how busy Members are, and it is no reflection upon a busy Member of this House when I say that probably not more than 10 per cent of the Members have read this bill; certainly have not read it carefully. It has only recently been reported, and Members are so busy that they can not, in the nature of things, read every bill that comes into the House; and at the risk of tiring the Members of the House, I am going to give a synopsis of the entire bill.

I anticipate that there are some Members of the House who hardly know that there is anything in this bill except the provision about labor. Now, there is a great deal more, gentlemen, as you will see, as I go along, section by section. I believe that a simple, straightforward, nontechnical statement as to its meaning may be helpful not only to the Members of the House, but to laymen who may care to know what the bill is and what it means.

Section 1, Mr. Chairman, is devoted entirely to terminology, as you will see. Section 2 provides—and let me call the attention of my friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], if he is here, and that of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], if he is here, to the fact that Messrs. GRAHAM and DANFORTH and DYER think there are too many teeth in section 2. We start right here with the teeth they object to.

Section 2 forbids any person to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections, if such commodities are sold for use within the United States or within any place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and if such discriminating sale is made with the purpose or intent to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller. The violation of this provision subjects a person to a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

This section does not apply when the discrimination in price is made on account of a difference in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity, or when the discrimination is only due to a difference in the cost of transportation. Nothing in this section prevents a person from selecting his own customers. The necessity for legislation of this character is apparent. Discriminating in price is a bludgeon which the trusts have often used to put competitors "out of business." For the last 20 years this practice has been one of the handmaids of monopoly, the advance guard of an army of arbitrary methods, which has injured and destroyed the business of thousands of smaller concerns.

The violation of this section subjects the person violating it to a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or a punishment not exceeding one year's imprisonment. But we provide—

That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

Section 3 forbids the owner or operator of any mine——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WEBB. For a question; yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that section 2 would prevent a retail merchant from discriminating in prices?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir. The retail merchant sells not in interstate commerce.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He might, of course, sell in interstate commerce, but it does not affect the general retail business?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir. That is generally intrastate, and we are dealing with interstate practices.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina why the trade commission was not given specific power to enforce a provision like that of section 2, which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. WEBB. One answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is that the Committee on the Judiciary did not have the consideration of the trade commission bill. That was in the Interstate Commerce Committee. Another reason is that in this section we make it a crime punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year to violate any of the provisions of that section.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Does the gentleman know that amendments to the trade-commission bill were ruled out of order on the ground that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce did not have jurisdiction of that subject, and that an amendment would clearly enlarge and change the scope of the bill? Apparently nobody has any jurisdiction over this sort of business. One committee has denied it, and the other committee says they could not do it because the other committee has it.

Mr. WEBB. We have exercised that jurisdiction, Mr. Chairman, in the second section of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, the purpose here is to provide a uniform price for all persons and customers for the same quality of goods?

Mr. WEBB. And under like conditions.

Mr. STAFFORD. About which there can not be any competition at all, so far as the seller is concerned, in meeting the competition of some other competitor?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; if he meets the competition of some other person, he is not meeting that competition for the purpose of destroying or wrongfully injuring his competitor.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEBB. I yield.

Mr. IGOE. Does this extend to the point of forbidding the giving of discounts on payments or discounts on goods bought in large quantities?

Mr. WEBB. Discounts are not mentioned in this section.

Mr. IGOE. Would it include discounts for payments upon a certain day?

Mr. WEBB. I can not answer that positively, but if such amounts to discrimination, directly or indirectly, the section covers it.

Mr. IGOE. It ought to.

Mr. GARNER. Not if all customers are treated exactly alike.

Mr. IGOE. A merchant might make his customer pay for that time.

Mr. WEBB. I think the seller who gives a discount to one person and not to another ought to be included within the provisions of this section, and is, in my opinion.

Mr. GARNER. He ought to be.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the purpose and object must be evil?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; the object must be evil, and to destroy the competitor or wrongfully injure him.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. It is the only question I expect to ask concerning the bill. I think the whole thing is wrapped up in this language, in line 12, page 21:

That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, and merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

And section 3 refers to other matters. Now, the question I want to ask is, if a monopoly in fact has the right under this law to go out over the country and select the persons to whom it will sell, then how can you have competition when that exclusive privilege is granted to a monopoly by law?

Mr. WEBB. In the first place, the gentleman assumes that a monopoly will be permitted to operate at will in the United States. We assume that if such monopoly does exist, it will be broken up under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, and we allow a person to select his own customer, because it is very doubtful whether you can forbid him doing that very thing.

But just one further suggestion. You will find that the evil in selecting customers is not in the mere selection of customers, but in the selection of a customer on condition that that customer will not sell a competitive article. We destroy the right to do that and make a person guilty of crime if a trust undertakes to sell an article to a merchant on condition that that merchant shall sell no competitive article.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Perhaps I should not have used the word "trust"; but here is what I had in mind—I will strike out the word "trust." Suppose an individual desires to go to the Harvester Co., which is a combination of all the manufacturers of harvesters in the United States, and offers that company the price at which it is selling binders and mowers and hayrakes to another person in his town. Can he do that under this bill? Would not the manufacturer have the right to say, "No; I will not accept your money, although you offer me the same price and the same terms which I am receiving from another citizen in your town"?

Mr. WEBB. That is undoubtedly true, and that is the law to-day. We have not changed the right of a man to select his own customer; but we have changed his right to select his customer on condition that that customer will not sell any competitive goods, and that is where the evil is most widespread in this country to-day and has been for 15 years.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question on this section?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, indeed.

Mr. BARTLETT. In what way does this section which you are now discussing change the law as it now is, as construed by the Supreme Court in the Tobacco case? Is it not a fact that one of the practices condemned by the Supreme Court in that case was the very thing that you now propose to prohibit?

Mr. WEBB. The difference between this section and the Tobacco case is this: Under this section there may be a hundred different offenses which are condemned, whereas under the Tobacco case it took all of those offenses combined to make them guilty of a restraint of interstate trade under the Sherman law. We condemn the individual acts which lead to a restraint of interstate trade, whereas at present you must show a sufficient number of such acts of restraint to make such a restraint as the Supreme Court will declare illegal under the trust laws.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is an answer to my question.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. With regard to this particular section and the question asked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT], I understand that to mean—and I am asking the question to be corrected if I am in error—that if there were two merchants in a village, town, or city who wanted the agency for some article, and both of them applied to the manufacturer asking to handle that article, the manufacturer under this section would have the right to decide which one of those two men he would deal with, and which one should have the agency in that town.

Mr. WEBB. That is true.

Mr. OGLESBY. That has nothing whatever to do with the question of price.

Mr. WEBB. Not at all.

Section 3 forbids the owner or operator of any mine or any person controlling the product of any mine to arbitrarily refuse to sell such product for use within the United States. The violation of this section subjects a person to the same punishment as is described in section 2.

This section is based upon the idea that the products of mines are naturally God given, and no person ought to have the right to arbitrarily refuse to sell such products of necessity to responsible persons who wish to buy them. Often in the chill of winter the products of a few mines have been monopolized by a few dealers, and the price of coal has been advanced arbitrarily, ofttimes taking advantage of those who are too poor to resist and too weak to protest against such outrages.

Mr. GARNER. Is there much difference in principle between the mining industry and the lumber industry? Lumber is a God-given product. It gives a house to shelter people in the winter. In the way in which that industry is carried on in this country to-day, the manufacturers refuse to sell to certain lumber dealers who do not comply with the conditions of the wholesaler. I do not see much difference in the principle that you apply to the mining industry and the principle that ought to apply to the lumber industry.

Mr. WEBB. There is some force to that suggestion. In fact, there is force in the suggestion that the section be made to apply to all raw material; but I beg the House to remember that in framing antitrust laws or amendments thereto you find more difficulty than you do in the performance of any other duty in this House. If you do not believe it, try it. It is easy to rise here and talk in generalities, but when you come to write your suggestions into the mandates of law you get into great difficulty and wade in much deep water.

Mr. GARNER. I do not intend this as a criticism.

Mr. WEBB. I understand.

Mr. GARNER. I am simply directing the attention of the committee to this matter because the gentleman has said that he and his committee and the President would welcome any amendment to this bill that sought to make it a better law. I have simply made this suggestion in response to that statement.

Mr. WEBB. I answered my friend with absolute frankness.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the Committee on the Judiciary clear in its judgment that this section is constitutional and enforcible?

Mr. WEBB. We are as reasonably clear on that as we can be, considering the decisions in reference to our interstate-commerce powers. It does announce a new principle, but we thought it was vital and important enough to base it upon many decisions which indicate that Congress has that power. We have undoubtedly the right to exclude coal companies from using interstate instrumentalities who do not obey the law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly as a negative proposition, but when you undertake to lay down an affirmative proposition, have you any precedents for that?

Mr. WEBB. As I said a moment ago, it is a new principle. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. I am keenly interested in section 3, and I am aware of the fact that we are all hoping for a decision from the Supreme Court soon on the common-carrier proposition of pipe lines.

Mr. WEBB. The oil case?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes. I wonder if the committee has given consideration to the proposition of divorcing the production of mines from the transportation. There is the real nucleus of the trouble. For instance, in the oil proposition the Standard Oil pipe lines and the Oil Trust, who have total control of carriage and transportation, go in and get alternative wells among the independent producers and refuse to take the oil of others because they are not common carriers. They will drain the land of oil by controlling these alternate wells. So it seems to me that two things might be considered in this section, one the bolstering up of the law of the common carrier and the other divorcing the production from transportation in any case.

Mr. WEBB. The committee did consider all that, but we felt that the control and regulation of common carriers was entirely within the jurisdiction and field of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we had a hesitancy in stepping over on their territory.

Mr. FERRIS. But your section 3 is closely allied to that.

Mr. WEBB. Section 3 takes care of the mines, and that means gas, oil, and coal. We did not go further and try to control those things that belong to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FERRIS. But those who suffer from faulty and inefficient laws should not fall between stools. They should not be compelled to suffer. The committee should deal effectively with it.

Mr. WEBB. We went as far as the jurisdiction of our committee would warrant us in going in providing what we have in that section, and we thought it would be encroaching on the Interstate Commerce Commission's field if we undertook to go further.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman speaks of the definition of the word "mine" as including oil and gas. Does the gentleman believe that that would include oil and gas wells?

Mr. WEBB. That was our interpretation.

Mr. FERRIS. I might say that that comes under a different branch of the mineral law. Oil and gas come under the placer mining laws and coal comes under the other laws.

Mr. AVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. AVIS. In asking the gentleman the question I expect to ask him, I want to say that I do not ask it in any partisan spirit. I come from a State that has 826 coal mines. The bituminous coal industry employs 73,000 men. I have received letters from hundreds of coal operators, irrespective of politics, who say to me that if this section is adopted it means the destruction of the small coal producer in the State of West Virginia. With that statement I want to add further, Did this committee in reporting on this measure consider the fact——

Mr. WEBB. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will ask his question, as I want to get through. I do not mean any discourtesy to the gentleman.

Mr. AVIS. I was trying to lead up to the point that I wanted to get at. You provide in this section that—

> It shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person—

And so forth.

Now, I have taken the trouble to find out whether that word "arbitrarily" has ever been judicially defined, and I only find two decisions. One is an English decision and one a decision from the State of West Virginia. In the English decision they held that the word "arbitrary" means "not supported by fair, solid, and substantial cause, and without reason given." The West Virginia definition says "without any reason therefor." Now, if these definitions are to apply, what, then, does the committee consider would be the meaning of "arbitrarily refused"? That is the question I am leading up to.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that it is a word ordinarily used. It means to act without justification, without cause, without reason, without just excuse. I think all of those are synonyms for the word "arbitrarily."

Mr. AVIS. Then that leaves it to the court to say what is a sufficient excuse, and the committee does not attempt to do so?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, we can not define it. That is for the court to define. You can not define fraud; you can not define a great many things. You have to leave that to the court.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WEBB. I hope the gentleman will pardon me, but I think the decisions of the courts ought to be read in the gentleman's own time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I notice the committee permits manufacturers and dealers in products to select their customers in different portions of the country, and under section 3 certain industrial corporations are forbidden from doing that same thing. Has the committee considered whether or not that might be regarded as in a sense class legislation—permitting one class of people to do a certain thing and forbidding another class to do the same thing?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; we have gone all through that. There is quite a difference, in the first place, from the moral side on the question of policy. One is the product as it naturally lies in the bowels of the earth, placed there by God Almighty, and we think that a man who happens to own it, no matter how he happened to get title to it, ought not to have the right arbitrarily to close his fist and say that he will not sell except to a favored few, especially when the products of mines are put there for the benefit of God's creatures.

Mr. BARTON and Mr. BAILEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I am very glad to yield to any gentleman for a short question, but I can not yield for debate.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that a distinction was made in this respect, that the man who sold the coal from the mine could not select his customers, but that the man who owned the vast forests and lumber could do it. Do I understand that statement correctly?

Mr. WEBB. We have not applied it to lumber. We have applied it to the products of the mines, and, as I frankly stated to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], there may be some good reason why it should also be applied to all raw materials, but we have not done it. Further, it may seem as if this provision is class legislation to some extent, but the Federal Constitution does not clearly forbid this kind of legislation when based on the commerce power vested in Congress. There are sections in the Constitution of the United States which forbid class legislation by the States, but these sections do not restrict Congress, though undoubtedly glaring class legislation would be repugnant to the spirit of our Constitution and the genius of our institutions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. There is nothing in this section or in the bill which makes it unlawful for a mine to be shut down and prices thus to be controlled.

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to inquire of the gentleman, if he will yield further, if he considered the advisability of inserting in section 3 the same regulation as to water power that he has as to the products of the mines. There is nothing on earth so susceptible of monopoly as falling water. It is not here to-day or to-morrow, but it is here for all time, and it brings light and heat and all of the multitudinous advantages that go into the home and into the city. I wondered why in the bill that the God-given commodities, the gentleman having referred to them in that term, ought not to include water. What could be more necessary than to include water power in that class?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will make the same answer to my friend from Oklahoma that I made to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. There may be some reason for including that in this section, and it all shows the difficulty of framing a bill of this character, the difficulties that we run against when we consider it, for one man wants water power, another man wants lumber, another wants oil, another coal, and another iron included. We thought we were making a good beginning by including in it all of the products of the mine, and if that works well in the future it may be that we can include the other products which the gentlemen have suggested this afternoon.

Mr. FERRIS. The question of water power is so intensely important——

Mr. WEBB. I agree it is.

Mr. FERRIS. Because falling water is so susceptible of monopoly, its use is so universal by everyone that if there is any place on earth where it would take hold it seems to me it is right there. Of course, I am not making this in any criticism.

Mr. WEBB. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Under the provisions of this section 3, would the adoption of this into law prevent a man who is losing money as a mine operator from closing down his mine?

Mr. WEBB. I think not; that would not be "arbitrary," as I think my friend knows, although he is not a lawyer, but he is a man of fine sense, and he would at once answer that question in the negative.

Mr. MADDEN. It looks to me as if it would.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question about section 2 which contains the so-called prohibition against discriminations?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER. I want to preface my question by saying that the bill seems to me expressly to permit discriminations, and on that point I will ask the gentleman how he interprets the proviso beginning on line 7:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation.

Observe that the proviso expressly allows discrimination on account of "quantity of commodity sold" and "difference in cost of transportation."

Now, the gentleman knows, that if a retailer buys in carload lots he pays less for goods and less for transporting them than does his small competitor who buys exactly similar goods in less-than-carload lots. This proviso specifically permits the big retailer to buy goods from a wholesaler at a less cost than his little competitor must pay to the same wholesaler, and it also permits the big man to have cheaper transportation than his little competitor can secure, and therefore the proviso gives the big man an opportunity to become bigger and bigger and more and more able to drive the little man to the wall. By this difference in the cost of exactly similar goods, bought from the same vendor, and by this difference in the cost of transportation authorized by this proviso, there is a direct permission of discrimination such as the bill was said to prohibit.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend if we did not take into consideration the cost of transportation we would be accused by that side, and possibly by ours, of making the most arbitrary rule ever sought to be enacted into law. That is a business method and practice you can not get away from, and, in addition, it has been the practice from time immemorial that a man buying wholesale lots necessarily is entitled to a little more consideration or a cheaper rate than the man who buys, to use an old expression, in "dribs" and "drabs," or by retail. That is a business necessity that the committee did not feel warranted in trying to disturb; and I am informed that this very provision, practically the same provision, exists in 17 or 19 of the States of the Union, and exists in the State of my friend from Wisconsin who now addresses this question to me.

Mr. COOPER. I am not attempting to argue nor make any statement as to the merits of the proposition.

The gentleman said "necessarily." Perhaps the word "customary" would be more accurate.

Mr. WEBB. I accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. COOPER. It is a germane amendment; entirely so. Another thing: This would allow great mail-order houses that buy in enormous quantities to retain the great advantage they have always had.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman draw a section that corrects the evil he mentions and present it at the proper time?

Mr. COOPER. I am simply asking about the bill, which the gentleman defends as a measure that will prevent discriminations in business.

Mr. WEBB. I think we have very high authority for this section, and one of the authorities is the State of Wisconsin, from which the gentleman comes.

Mr. AVIS. I hope the gentleman will yield for one more question.

Mr. WEBB. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I must get on to another section. This bill has 23 sections in it.

Mr. Chairman, section 4 provides against any person making a sale of any commodities for use in the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon any such price, on condition or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, and so fort , of a competitor. A violation of this section subjects the person violating it to a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. This section strikes at another fruitful source of monopoly or restraint of trade. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that no one has the right to sell goods to a purchaser and receive his money for them and at the same time compel such purchaser to refuse to sell a competitive article. Such contract in itself is in restraint of trade and tends directly to monopoly. This practice has been in vogue in the United States for 20 years, and there is scarcely a retail merchant throughout this broad land who has not suffered from such practice, because our country has been literally plastered with these exclusive-sale contracts. And yet our friends tell us that there are no teeth in this section of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Just for a question.

Mr. WILLIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether his committee considered the effect that this would have on the small producer? Now, I am asking that question because there have come to me a number of protests from small concerns. For example, I have in mind a case of a manufacturer of machine tools in my home town, a small concern that employs 40 or 50 men. They take this position, that the only way that they have been able to sell their product is by making exclusive trade agreements with agents in different cities of the United States and that if this bill be enacted into law it will permit an outsider to come in and sell the product under the name in which the product has been worked up in that town, and that will destroy their agency, and therefore will play directly into the hands of their monopolistic competitor. They are up against very severe competition, with a strong organization back of it. Now, what does the gentleman say to that?

Mr. WEBB. I think the small concern which the gentleman mentions has been compelled to adopt that method by the very trusts that first adopted it. He is compelled to adopt it as a matter of self-defense. It is one of the trust's greatest weapons to destroy the little business, which we in this section are trying to protect. The small concern can make a careful selection of a good man to push and introduce its goods, and at the same time have the advantage of not permitting the trust to go to a neighborhood and monopolize on a certain article. As it is today, the trust goes to a crossroads merchant and there binds the merchant to sell no article except an article controlled by the trust. Now, what chance has a little fellow to get in with that merchant? He can not do it. He has no place in which to sell his goods. But this section will give your independent concern a right to go to the small merchant and tell him that he is not bound to refuse to sell a competitive article. The law gives him the right to sell that trust-made article and his, too, and the little man can tell him that he would like to have his article put in stock with the other. That would be better for the independent and better for the merchant.

Mr. WILLIS. They make this further objection, that the trust, by its great wealth, is able to maintain its own distributing agencies, but that if this right which they now enjoy is taken away from them, they will have no means whatever of maintaining these agencies, not having the great wealth with which to do it. What is the gentleman's opinion of that objection?

Mr. WEBB. Well, there may be some force in that suggestion, but it is a situation that Congress can not remedy. It is just a condition that we face when we see one strong man, weighing 180 pounds, in a contest with a man who weighs 65 or 100 pounds. It is a condition we meet with—a man worth a million dollars in a contest against a fellow who has only $500. If my friend can tell us a remedy for that, we will be glad to have it. We desire to unfetter both the merchant and the man who sells to the merchant and give him a fair field, and tell him, "You can buy from whom you please and sell wherever you please."

Mr. AVIS. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. AVIS. The gentleman has stated that the purpose here is to prevent the big fellow swallowing up the little fellow. Take, for instance, the coal business. I am a small operator. I have built up a trade by years of work, and what is to prevent the big fellow from coming over and taking my whole output and destroying my trade for that particular year?

Mr. WEBB. I suppose the gentleman would not want me to say he ought to be allowed to get it "vi et armis."

Mr. AVIS. You have coal mentioned there—that you can not refuse to sell to the first responsible bidder. Suppose I am a small coal dealer, and some big man comes along and lays down his certified check—a man representing a monopoly—and says, "I bid for your entire product of coal." What is to prevent him from destroying the trade that I have been for years building up?

Mr. WEBB. You would have the right to supply your customers and continue to sell to them.

Mr. AVIS. Does not the gentleman think I would have the right to prefer one customer over another—to prefer my old customers? Yet your bill forbids that.

Mr. WEBB. You can supply one customer and not meet the demands of monopoly.

Mr. AVIS. I thought the gentleman's statement as to section 3 was to the effect that it was intended to prevent discrimination between customers who sold coal and oil and minerals.

Mr. WEBB. It is so intended, and the object of that is to prevent you from selling your entire product to a monopoly when the little man wants to buy from you.

Mr. AVIS. I can not refuse to sell my product to any responsible bidder. That is the objection I have pointed out. I do not point this out in any partisan spirit. I really and sincerely think it would destroy nearly 700 independent coal people in my country, because the big fellows would come along and say, "I am willing to take your entire product, the whole of it, or a part of it"; and yet I, as a coal dealer, may have been building up my trade for years, and the section says I must not sell my whole product to the trust.

Mr. WEBB. You have other customers in whom you have confidence, and you can sell to them.

Mr. AVIS. Evidently the gentleman does not understand me. I said that under this particular language the trust might destroy my trade.

Mr. WEBB. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," I will say to the gentleman; and I think he should quiet his fears, for the danger he fears does not lie in this section.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. In connection with section 4 I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if there is a provision in the bill which prohibits a man selling to a purchaser on the condition that he does not buy from any other seller? Is there any provision here that would require a trust or a big manufacturer who makes a fine article to sell to the little man?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Mr. COOPER. Why should there not be? That is exactly what goes on now. Suppose there are two little concerns in a given village. One of them is already engaged in selling certain articles that are useful and which have a large sale. There is a demand for another article of the same general description, but the maker of that other article will sell it to only one of those two stores in the village. Why should he not be compelled to sell to the customer, a bona fide, responsible customer, just the same as you propose to provide that the mine owner shall sell his products?

Mr. WEBB. We took this view of it: The man who, with his own industry and with his own money, manufactures or transforms the raw material into some useful object ought to have the right to select his purchaser; but we did not think that ought to apply to the man who takes products from the bowels of the earth as God deposited them.

Mr. COOPER. How would that be with a brand of flour?

Mr. WEBB. Well, there is more advancement in the manufacture of flour from the wheat than on the production of coal and oil that are simply taken from the bowels of the earth.

Mr. COOPER. We are trying to pass a law that will promote fair and square dealing and legitimate competition, are we not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; but there are thousands of things that can not be covered by a bill of this class.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to have the gentleman assign a reason why he has not done in this bill what I have suggested. Does not the gentleman want to, or can he not do it?

Mr. WEBB. It is a question of policy. We think we ought not.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I hope that my friend the new chairman of the committee will pardon a suggestion. In common with many others I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement, and if these interruptions are permitted—and the gentleman is too courteous to decline—I fear we shall not hear the gentleman complete his speech. I therefore suggest that hereafter the gentleman decline further interruptions until he can complete his able and satisfactory statement. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, section 5 gives any person who may be injured in his business, by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws, the right to sue for such injury in any district court where the defendant resides, or is found without respect to the amount in controversy and shall recover threefold the damages sustained, together with the cost of the suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee. This section opens the door of justice to every man, whenever he may be injured by those who violate the antitrust laws, and gives the injured party ample damages for the wrong suffered.

Section 6 provides that when the Government brings a suit in equity against an alleged trust, and the final judgment is rendered in such suit to the effect that the defendant has or has not entered into a contract or conspiracy in the form of a trust or restraint of trade or commerce, that said final judgment may be used as evidence in any other proceeding brought by an individual against the same defendant, and shall be conclusive evidence of the same facts and the same questions of law, in favor of or against any party in any suit brought under the provisions of the antitrust laws.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I hope the gentleman will wait until I get through with my statement. Then I will be glad to answer any questions.

This section also suspends the running of the statute of limitations against individuals whenever the Government brings an equity suit against any person charged with violating the antitrust laws.

Section 7 provides that the antitrust laws shall not be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers, agricultural or horticultural organizations, orders or associations instituted for mutual help and having no capital stock and not conducted for profit; neither shall the antitrust laws be construed to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from carrying out the legitimate objects of such organizations. This section also permits the operation of traffic associations which are under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Section 8 forbids any corporation to acquire the capital stock of another corporation when both are engaged in commerce, if the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between such corporations or to create a monopoly of any line of trade anywhere. Nor shall any corporation acquire the capital stock of two or more corporations engaged in commerce if the effect of such acquisition or the use of such stock, by voting or otherwise, is to eliminate or substantially lessen such competition between corporations or to create a monopoly in any line of trade anywhere.

This section exempts purchases of stock for investment solely, and where same is not used by voting or bringing about or lessening competition.

This section permits one corporation to form subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, and such parent corporation may own or hold the stock of such subsidiary corporations when this does not eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

This section does not apply to stock transactions heretofore legally made.

Under this section a railroad corporation may construct branch lines, so located as to become feeders, and the parent corporation may own all of or any part of the stock of such branch lines, and a railroad corporation may acquire the stock of a branch line constructed by an independent company where there is no substantial competition between the two. A railroad company under this section is permitted to extend its lines by buying the stock of other railroad companies where there is no substantial competition between the two.

A violation of the provision of this act subjects a person to a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

The common law never allowed one corporation to own the stock of another, but by degrees some of the States have relaxed this rule until the country has become burdened with pools and holding companies which are direct supports of trusts or monopolies. Pooling is practically a partnership of corporations, and their contracts have become nonenforceable, which gives them a fatal weakness. When the pool became a failure on account of this weakness the trust was formed by each corporation transferring its stock to common trustees. Thus, all of the stock of the component corporations was held by trustees, who completely controlled the business of all the corporations in the trust. Each constituent company retained its officers and continued its business, but the amount and price of its product was controlled by the trustees. This form of trust was clearly a partnership of corporations, with the business of all controlled by one head, and we are not surprised to find that this form of trust was declared illegal in the early nineties.

So the next stage of corporation partnership was the holding company, where the stock of each company is transferred to the holding corporation, and this corporation actually owns the stock of the constituent companies, making the constituent corporations subsidiary instead of independent; but in holding corporations the company controls the policy and price of commodities of constituent or subsidiary corporations.

The first State to repeal the common-law principle that any corporation could own the stock of another corporation was New Jersey. The States of Delaware, West Virginia, and Maine soon followed the lead of New Jersey.

After the holding companies came the complete merger, where the stock of the constituent companies is actually bought in and canceled, the only stock being that of the master company. This act does not prohibit all holding companies, but only those which substantially lessen competition.

Section 9 provides that after two years from the approval of the act no person who is a member of a partnership or is a director or officer of a corporation engaged in producing or selling materials or supplies or in the construction of railroads shall act as director or officer of any other corporation or common carrier to which such person sells or leases equipment or supplies, and that no officer or director of a bank shall act as director or officer of any such common carrier for which he or such bank acts as agent for or underwriter of the sale or disposal by such common carrier of its securities or from which he or such bank purchases the securities of such common carriers. That two years from the passage of this act no person shall be a director, officer, and so forth, of more than one bank or trust company at the same time if either of such banks or trust companies has deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000, and no private bank or person who is director in a bank or trust company organized under the laws of a State having deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000 shall be a director in any bank organized under the laws of the United States. The eligibility of a director is determined by the average amount of deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits, as shown by a statement of such bank filed under the law during the fiscal year preceding the date set for the annual election of directors, and when a director has been elected according to the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to remain such director for one year.

This section further provides that no United States banking company in a city of more than 100,000 population shall have as a director, officer, or employee any private banker or director of any other bank or trust company located in the same place.

This section does not apply to mutual savings banks without capital stock, nor does it apply to the directors of one bank or one trust company when the entire capital stock of either is owned by the stockholders of the other. Nor does it repeal the provisions of the Federal reserve act which permits a director in class A of said act to be a director of one member bank.

This section further provides that after two years from the approval of the act no person shall at the same time be a director in two or more corporations either of which has a capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000 if such corporations shall have been theretofore competitors to such an extent that an elimination of competition by agreement between them would be a violation of any provision of the antitrust laws. Eligibility of stockholders under this section is determined by the aggregate capital, surplus, and undivided profits, exclusive of dividends declared but not paid, at the end of the fiscal year next preceding the election of directors, and a director who is elected under the provisions of this act may continue as such for at least one year.

Violation of the provisions of this act subjects a person to a fine of $100 a day during the continuance of such violation, or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Section 10 allows suit, under the antitrust law, to be brought in any district where the defendant is an inhabitant or may be found.

Section 11 provides that in suits brought by the United States subpœnas for witnesses may run into any district.

Section 12 provides that when a corporation is found guilty of violating the antitrust laws the offense shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, and agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the prohibited acts, and such directors or officers are deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subjected to a fine of not more than $5,000, or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both. In this section we have attempted to make guilt personal, and we believe we have succeeded in doing so.

The President, in his message of January 20, 1914, on this subject, said:

> We ought to see to it, and the judgment of practical and sagacious men of affairs everywhere would applaud us if we do see to it, that penalties and punishments should fall not upon business itself, to its confusion and interruption, but upon the individuals who use the instrumentalities of business to do things which public policy and sound business practice condemn. Every act of business is done at the command or upon the initiative of some ascertainable person or group of persons. These should be held individually responsible, and the punishment should fall upon them, not upon the business organization of which they make illegal use.

Section 13 gives the district courts jurisdiction to restrain and prevent violations of this act and makes it the duty of the district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General, to bring suits to prevent and restrain such violations. Such suits may be brought by way of petition, and after the parties complained of shall have been duly notified, the court shall proceed to hear and determine the case. During the pendency of the suit the court may issue temporary restraining orders, and the court may require other parties to be brought before the court, whether they reside in the district or not, and subpœnas to that end may be served in any district.

Section 14 gives any person the right to sue for injunctive relief against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws when and under the same conditions as injunctive relief is granted under the rules governing such proceedings; and upon giving proper bond and showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate, then a preliminary injunction may issue, but no one shall bring suit in equity for injunctive relief against a common carrier except the United States.

Section 15 regulates the issuance of injunctions and conforms largely to the rules of the United States Supreme Court.

Section 16 provides that, except as provided in section 14, a restraining or interlocutory order of injunction shall not issue, unless security is given in such manner as the court may deem proper.

Section 17 requires that all orders of injunction or restraining orders shall set forth the reasons for issuance of same, be specific in terms, and describe in reasonable detail the act sought to be restrained, and shall bind only the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, attorneys, or those in actual concert with them, and who shall, by personal service or otherwise, have received actual notice of the same.

Section 18 provides that no restraining order or injunction shall be granted in a case between employer and employee or between persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the applicant, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney, and, further, that no restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work, or from recommending or persuading others by peaceful means so to do, or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or quit work, or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from advising others by peaceful means to do so, or by paying or giving to or withholding from any strike benefits, or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

Mr. Chairman, when you read section 7, together with sections 17 and 18, the members of the Judiciary Committee declare unto this House, unto the country, and unto the laboring people that we have given them a bill of rights. We have given them a magna charta. We have given them what they have been demanding from this Congress for 20 long years, and I therefore express the hope that the sections in this bill which seem to be unsatisfactory to the trusts, monopolies, and unscrupulous business of the country—because we know that they are not particularly anxious to look after the laboring class of people—may be adopted by this committee and this House. We hear, on the other hand, that there may be some criticism from some quarter that we have not gone far enough in the interest of labor; but I appeal to the sensible men, the patriotic men on both sides of this floor, to agree that in these various sections of this bill we have given labor a bill of rights and a new charter. I trust that those who represent laboring men as I do—and in this connection I want to say that never in 11 years' service here have I voted against labor on the floor of this House or in the committee—will tell them, as I tell them as their friend, that they have a great charter in this bill, and that they ought to be thankful that it is here and be satisfied with it. I appeal to the men who represent labor directly. I have not a labor union in my district, and yet I have stood by labor and am standing by them now, because we have given them something that the head of the American Federation of Labor and other labor organizations of the United States have been clamoring for lo these many years; and, having gotten it, I believe they should sing a pean of joy and accept it as it is written in this bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman state what definite and particular objections he has to the amendments that the laboring men ask for—why he objects to granting them?

Mr. WEBB. I do not care to discuss that at this time for good reasons, but we shall discuss it fully later.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WEBB. Just for a question.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman please state how many members of this committee that considered this bill have coal mines in their districts?

Mr. WEBB. I have not made a poll of the committee, and do not know.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the next section of the bill is designed to give laboring men the right of trial by jury in indirect contempt cases where the contempt also involves the commission of a criminal offense either under statute or common law. That is another demand labor has made on Congress for many years. They now have it within their grasp.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. In explaining the right to peaceably ask another person to work or to refrain from working you use the language "at or near a person's residence or home."

Mr. WEBB. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Not residence or home, but at any place, in a lawful manner.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I would like to know if that would not allow a person to go into a man's residence for the purpose of persuading a workingman—peacefully, of course—to work or not to work?

Mr. WEBB. I think if he goes peacefully, if permitted to go in by the owner of the house, he could do so. If the owner of a house shuts his door, a person could not go in. There is no objection to a man going to my home or yours if he is permitted to do so by the owner of the castle.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. The gentleman thinks the owner of the house could keep him out?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, of course; that is his castle. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied one hour and nine minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, sections 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23 provide for a trial by jury of indirect contempts.

Section 19 provides that any person disobeying a writ, order, or decree of a district court, or of the District of Columbia, by doing any act or thing therein forbidden to be done, if the act or thing done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense, either by statute or common law, shall be proceeded against in the following manner—section 20, that is—when it appears to the court, by the return of an officer or upon affidavit of some person or upon information filed by the district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the judge may issue a rule requiring such person to show cause, upon a certain day, why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged, giving him time to prepare for and make return to the order. If his return does not sufficiently purge himself, in the opinion of the court, a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court. If the person fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer.

In all cases arising under this section such trial may be held by the court, or if accused demand same, by jury, in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors in attendance, or the judge in chambers may cause a sufficient number to be selected and summoned to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled, as upon a trial for misdemeanor, and shall proceed as in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment. If the accused shall be found guilty, judgment shall be entered describing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both. The fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other person injured by the act constituting the contempt, but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States by a natural person exceed the sum of $1,000, nor shall imprisonment exceed a term of six months.

Section 21 provides that evidence in such cases may be preserved and prescribes the method of appeal, and when a writ of error is granted execution of judgment shall be stayed and the accused admitted to bail.

Section 22 provides that nothing contained in this bill shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States.

Section 23 provides that no action for contempt shall be brought against a person after one year from the date of the act complained of, nor shall any such proceeding bar a criminal prosecution for the same act, and nothing herein shall affect pending cases at the time of the approval of this act.

Mr. Speaker, there is a general demand among lawyers and laymen throughout the United States for some check or limitation upon the power of Federal judges, who both try and punish for contempt. I believe that it is almost universally agreed that cases arising under section 19 of this act should be tried by a jury if the accused demands it. There are some who believe that a jury trial should be allowed in all indirect contempt cases.

The time may come before a great while when all indirect contempt cases will be tried by jury.

On the increasing growth of the power of the Federal courts I wish to read the following extract from an article written by Judge Henry Clay Caldwell, who was appointed Federal judge in 1864 by Abraham Lincoln, and who served as a Federal judge for 39 years:

> The modern writ of injunction is used for purposes which bear no more resemblance to the uses of the ancient writ of that name than the milky way bears to the sun. Formerly it was used to conserve the property in dispute between private litigants, but in modern times it has taken the place of the police powers of the State and Nation. It enforces and restrains with equal facility the criminal laws of the State and Nation. * * * In proceedings for contempt for an alleged violation of the injunction the judge is the lawmaker, the injured party, the prosecutor, the judge, and the jury. It is not surprising that, uniting in himself all these characters, he is commonly able to obtain a conviction. While the penalty which the judge can inflict by direct sentence for a violation of his code is fine or imprisonment, limited only by his discretion, capital punishment may be inflicted by indirection. All that seems to be necessary to this end is to issue a writ to the marshal or sheriff commanding him to prevent a violation of the judge's code, and then the men, with injunction nooses around their necks, may be quickly dispatched if they attempt to march across this injunction deadline. It is said the judge does not punish for a violation of the statutory offense, but only for a violation of his order prohibiting the commission of the statutory offense. Such reasoning as this is what Carlyle calls "logical cobwebbery." The web is not strong enough to deprive the smallest insect of its liberty, much less an American citizen. * * * A jurisdiction that is not required to stop somewhere will stop nowhere.
> Prof. Baird says fish have no maturity, but continue to grow until they die. This curious characteristic of fish is a very intensified form in the equitable octopus called injunction, for that has no maturity and never dies, and its jurisdiction grows and extends perpetually and unceasingly.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not deprive the court of the power to punish for contempt in certain cases, but gives the accused the right to have the issue of his guilt or innocence tried by 12 men before punishment can be inflicted by the judge. It is wise to allow juries to try questions of fact, although there are some who are assaulting the jury system and declare it is a failure, but, in my opinion, it is the most perfect system ever devised by man to determine a controversy between man and man.

The Star Chamber in England tried to abolish the jury system and brought about a revolution. Our country's jurisprudence will never decline, and our country will always remain strong and great so long as the jury system is preserved inviolate and incorrupt.

It has been strenuously argued that Congress has no power to limit inferior courts in the exercise of their power to punish for contempt. The Constitution does say the judicial power of the United States shall be vested or shall rest in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time establish. I take it that if you run down the decisions from 1709 to the present time you will not find a decision of any court but what says that these inferior courts are absolutely and entirely the creatures of Congress, and surely the power that can create can also limit the power of the creature. Inherent powers! There are no inherent powers in any inferior court. The only power that a district court possesses is that prescribed by Congress—the body that creates it—otherwise we could bring into being a power that would be superior to the creator.

On the question of the power of Congress to limit the courts in their punishment for indirect contempts, I wish to cite a few authorities.

The first authority I wish to cite in this connection was written in 1799 in the case of Turner against The Bank of North America, in Fourth Dallas. Counsel said:

> It is, then, to be remarked that the judicial power is the grant of the Constitution, and Congress can no more limit than enlarge the constitutional grant.

Then Judge Ellsworth, Chief Justice at that time, interrupted this argument and said:

> How far is it meant to carry this argument? Will it be affirmed that in every case to which the judicial power of the United States extends the Federal courts may exercise the jurisdiction, without the intervention of the legislature, to distribute and regulate the power?

Justice Chase said:

The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, but the political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to this court, we possess it, not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power to us or to any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal. Besides, Congress is not bound, and it would perhaps be inexpedient, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject in every form which the Constitution might warrant.

That was in 1799, and, gentlemen, from that good hour to this the suggestions of Chief Justice Chase and Judge Ellsworth have been followed.

Now, in United States v. Hudson (7 Cranch, p. 31):

Of all the courts which the United States may, under their general powers, constitute, one only—the Supreme Court—possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the Constitution and of which the legislative power can not deprive it. All other courts created by the General Government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power that creates them, and can be vested with none but what the power ceded to the General Government will authorize them to confer. * * * For the power which Congress possesses to create courts of inferior jurisdiction necessarily implies the power to limit the jurisdictions of those courts to particular objects; and when a court is created and its operations confined to certain specific objects, with what propriety can it assume to itself a jurisdiction much more extended, in its very nature very indefinite, applicable to a great variety of subjects, varying in every State in the Union, and with regard to which there exists no definite criterion of distribution between the district and circuit courts of the same district?

We next come to Third Howard, on page 245, Cary against Curtis, and I may say that this decision was affirmed in Fink against O'Neil, in One hundred and sixth United States.

Says the court:

Secondly, the doctrine so often ruled in this court, that the judicial power of the United States, although it has its origin in the Constitution, is (except in enumerated instances applicable exclusively to this court) dependent for its distribution and organization, and for the modes of its exercise, entirely upon the action of Congress, who possess the sole power of creating the tribunals (inferior to the Supreme Court) for the exercise of the judicial power and of investing them with jurisdiction, either limited, concurrent, or exclusive, and of withholding jurisdiction from them in the exact degrees and character which to Congress may seem proper for the public good. To deny this position would be to elevate the judicial over the legislative branch of the Government and to give to the former powers limited by its own discretion merely. It follows, then, that the courts created by statute must look to the statute as the warrant for their authority; certainly they can not go beyond the statute and assert an authority with which they may not be invested by it or which may be clearly denied to them.

* * * The existence of the judicial act itself, with its several supplements, furnishes proof unanswerable on this point. The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law.

What can be stronger, gentlemen, than that decision rendered in Third Howard and reaffirmed in One hundred and sixth United States in the case of Fink against O'Neil, at page 280?

Now, here is still another authority to which I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House, found in Forty-ninth United States, or Eighth Howard—Sheldon against Sill, page 441:

Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers.

It is absurd, it seems to me, to hold that the creator can create a thing which, after it is created, becomes bigger and more powerful than its creator. It was never so intended by the founders of the Government, and it is opposed to the genius of our institutions to suppose a thing created can become more powerful than the people who created it. Now, in this decision Judge Grier, rendering it, says:

It must be admitted that if the Constitution had ordained or established the inferior courts, and distributed to them their respective powers, they could not be restricted or divested by Congress.

Nobody undertakes to say that we can restrict or divest the power of the Supreme Court of the United States, because that court was created by the Constitution, and that is the distinction this judge draws here:

But as it has made no such distribution, one of two consequences must result—either that each inferior court created by Congress must exercise all the judicial powers not given to the Supreme Court, or that Congress, having the power to establish the courts, must define their respective jurisdictions. The first of these inferences has never been asserted, and could not be defended with any show of reason, and, if not, the latter would seem to follow as a necessary consequence, and it would seem to follow also that, having a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all.

The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit court; consequently the statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution, unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.

Such has been the doctrine held by this court since its first establishment. To enumerate all the cases in which it has been either directly advanced or tacitly assumed would be tedious and unnecessary.

I cite still another authority, Mr. Chairman. It is in Eighteenth Wallace, page 577, and is known as the case of the sewing machine companies. It bears out the decision which I have just read. It is as follows:

Circuit courts do not derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, as appears with sufficient explicitness from the Constitution itself, as the first section of the third article provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Consequently the jurisdiction of the circuit court in every case must depend upon some act of Congress, as it is clear that Congress, inasmuch as it possesses the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, may also define their jurisdiction. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction in controversies but such as the statute confers. Congress, it may be conceded, may confer such jurisdiction upon the circuit courts as it may see fit within the scope of the judicial power of the Constitution not vested in the Supreme Court, but as such tribunals are neither created by the Constitution nor is their jurisdiction defined by that instrument, it follows that inasmuch as they are created by an act of Congress it is necessary in every attempt to define their power to look to that source as the means of accomplishing that end. Federal judicial power, beyond all doubt, has its origin in the Constitution, but the organization of the system and the distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction among such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish within the scope of the judicial power always have been and of right must be the work of the Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in Nineteenth Wallace, Robinson's case, at pages 510 and 511, we have a contempt case. The syllabus says:

The act of March 2, 1831, entitled "An act declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court," provides in its first section:

"That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts."

Mr. Justice Field in that case, after stating the facts, delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts; its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders, and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power. But the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 2, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may perhaps be a matter of doubt; but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is therefore to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases: First, where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; second, where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transactions; and, third, where there has been disobedience or resistance by any officer, party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts.

There is no inherent power suggested there, because the Supreme Court says that Congress has the right to limit the power of the courts of this country to punish for contempt to three classes of cases. Now, if Congress can reduce them to three, it can reduce them to one, and if they can reduce them to one, Congress can destroy contempt cases altogether, and if Congress destroys them altogether, why can not it say that in certain cases a jury must intervene and determine whether or not the party is guilty before the judge shall inflict punishment?

"But," says the court, "the power is limited." What power? The power to punish for contempt. By whom is it limited? Nobody but the law-making power. Justice Field says:

The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may perhaps be a matter of doubt

We find in this case, Nineteenth Wallace, Eighty-sixth United States, that we can limit the power over contempt in the circuit and district courts. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in three classes of cases.

This is a direct decision in point, gentlemen of the House, which declares that the Congress has the power to limit the punishment to three classes of cases; and if it has the power to limit the punishment to three classes of cases, we can limit that power to one class or abolish it altogether. I contend that if Congress desires to take away from the inferior courts all power to punish for contempt it can do it.

We could abolish the circuit courts of the United States—which we have done—and the Commerce Court, the district courts, and all the courts, except the Supreme Court; and, therefore, it is absurd to argue that while we have the power to destroy we have not the power to regulate the thing we create.

I can not see how any lawyer can read these authorities from 1799 to the present and then contend that the people who create these courts through their Representatives in Congress have no right to provide that before a man shall be convicted of crime by a judge there shall be flung between him and the judge's arbitrary power a jury of 12 men—one of the most sacred institutions in all the world, and especially to the people of the United States—simply to pass upon the facts and say whether he is guilty. If the man is guilty, the judge has all the power he needs to punish, provided it does not exceed six months' imprisonment or a fine of $1,000. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15657 and other bills embraced in the order of the House, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, should not the chairman of the committee make a report to the House that the committee has had under consideration the bill H. R. 15613 and had laid it aside with a favorable recommendation, and not that it had come to no decision thereon? Under the rule that would hold it in abeyance until all three of the bills were passed upon in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The House does not pass upon one bill until it gets through with all three.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the chairman has made a report that it has come to no decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee is correct. If he was not, when they got through with the first bill the committee would rise and he would make a report. This is like the procedure when we are in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 12806. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside; and

H. R. 16508. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 149. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation of the French Republic to participate in an International Congress of Musical Science and History, to be held at Paris; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the gentleman from Wisconsin misunderstood the situation. The motion was that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation. It was passed unanimously. Of course there were no Republicans here, except a few, but they all acquiesced in the favorable result.

The SPEAKER. That question has been settled authoritatively.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Connecticut does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. Under the rule are we to have a session this evening?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the rule requires the House to take a recess until 8 o'clock, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] will act as Speaker pro tempore this evening.

RECESS.

Accordingly the House (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House was called to order by Mr. FERRIS, Speaker pro tempore, at 8 p. m.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and other bills under the special order.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15657 and other bills under the special order, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], who has control of the time on the other side, to use some of his time now, as we have used 1 hour and 25 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to enter into an extended discussion of this bill. I have been too busy with other matters to prepare anything like a speech, still there are some features to which I desire to call attention. When this session met it was generally understood that it would be devoted largely to trust legislation. A great many promises were made, a great many assurances were given as to what was going to be accomplished at this session. One thing that I remember which was especially emphasized was the necessity of erasing from the Sherman antitrust act the word "reasonable," said to have been inserted in it by the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil Co. decision. It was also urged that in many other respects the act needed to be strengthened.

Early in the session we commenced hearings in the Committee on the Judiciary, and somewhere along during the last of January or the first of February, four bills made their appearance as committee bills. Upon one of these there was an indorsement to the effect that another bill would be later introduced—one on holding companies. Those bills became known familiarly as the "Five Brothers."

The bill now under consideration embodies some features from all of those bills, except one—the so-called definitions bill.

That bill was designed to restore the Sherman Act to its former vigor and add some additional teeth. That bill has entirely disappeared in the shuffle. It is known that the President has been repeatedly consulted, but the Republican Members only know of these consultations through the newspapers or from some occasional remark dropped by those in the secret. In the years past the Democrats have loudly condemned this secret method of framing legislation. No one can tell just what sort of influences write bills when written in this fashion. Section 8 of this bill is the section that most directly affects the trusts. This is the one that deals with holding companies and the right of one company to acquire the capital stock of another company. The overshadowing importance of this section can not be doubted when it is remembered that nearly every trust has been formed by the purchase of the capital stock of one corporation by another corporation. If such purchases are permitted, the formation of trusts is permitted. The English common law condemns the practice of one corporation purchasing the capital stock of another corporation, upon the ground that it tends to monopoly. Our courts supported this view until different States, eager to profit by a tax on corporate franchises, removed this restriction to encourage the formation of corporations. Congress has not legalized the practice. Do we legalize it in this bill? If we do, the effect is to practically repeal the Sherman Antitrust Act.

If this section is enacted it will become a definite legislative declaration by Congress of its policy in regard to the formation of trusts, a policy that courts will necessarily apply not only to future but also to present trusts. The policy in this bill differs radically from that under present law. Under the law as it stands, it is not necessary to show that a combination actually restrains or monopolizes trade or commerce in order to bring them within the language of the law. It is enough that the necessary effect of the combination is to give it the power to do those things. The decisive question is whether the power exists, not whether it has been exercised. In the Northern Securities Co. case, the Trans-Missouri, Joint Traffic, Pearsal, and Addyston cases, the United States Supreme Court held that it was immaterial that trade or commerce had not actually been restrained; that it made no difference, even, that rates and prices had been lowered, it being enough to bring the combination within the condemnation of the act that it had the power to restrain trade or commerce. But under the two first paragraphs of this section the existence of this power is not sufficient to make the combination illegal; it is necessary to show, in addition, that the consolidation of two competing corporations effected an elimination or substantial lessening of competition or that it has created a monopoly in any line of trade in any section or community. In paragraph 3 it is necessary to go still further; it there requires a showing that competition has been lessened by voting the stock that has been consolidated. In other words, the vice in this section is that it permits the formation of a trust and in effect declares this trust legal until it eliminates or substantially lessens competition or creates a monopoly, while under the present law the combination is declared illegal if it possesses the power to restrain commerce, whether it has that effect or not. If this section 8 had been in force when the Northern Securities Co. case was tried, the Government would have lost it, as no restraint of trade was shown in that case. There had been no substantial lessening of competition at the time when that suit was instituted that could be established. A combination can easily conduct its business so that it will be impossible to show that competition has been entirely eliminated or to show that a monopoly has been created as the word "monopoly" is construed by our courts. To prove that the consolidation has substantially lessened competition will be almost as difficult. No one can tell how the word "substantial" will be construed. As used in this section it may mean that the competition must be largely lessened. This word "substantial" is so indefinite that it affords the courts no guide. As applied to the facts in any ordinary case of conflicting testimony it will give them a license to hold that anything short of almost entire elimination of competition is legal.

To illustrate the vicious effect of the requirement that the combinations to be illegal must destroy or substantially lessen competition, let me suggest that if a corporation is formed to erect a factory to produce an article in competition with some other corporation, this section will permit the consolidation of these companies at any time before actual competition commences. Until then there can be no elimination or lessening of competition. Or if a company now engaged in business desires to enter new territory it can first purchase the capital stock of the corporation that would become its competitor; by doing so it has not lessened competition, because until it enters the new field there is no competition to lessen. To prevent and not to lessen competition a corporation may, under this section, purchase the capital stock of another corporation to prevent the latter from increasing its output of competitive goods. This need not lessen; it may even increase competition, though in effect it restrains trade as the law is now construed. The most astonishing proposition is that contained in the third paragraph of this section. The purpose of that paragraph is to permit a corporation to purchase the stock of other corporations solely for investment purposes. The only limitation upon this right is that the corporation making the purchase must not use the stock by voting or otherwise to bring about or attempt to bring about the substantial lessening of competition. It may make this purchase even though it create an absolute monopoly. How anyone with any knowledge of trust methods could propose such a provision as in aid of the Sherman Antitrust Act is difficult to understand. The Northern Securities Co. was an investment company pure and simple. It had no power to run a railroad; its only function, as it insisted on the trial, was that of an investment company. The Supreme Court was not deceived by so thin a disguise. It saw clearly what every man in his senses saw, that competition between two roads that were in fact owned by the same party—the Northern Securities Co.—would be a sham. No incentive for competition remained. Every expenditure for the purpose of taking trade from each other would be a loss to the stockholders. In this provision the same vice that I have already called attention to appears. It is not sufficient that the combination created by these investments may result in the lessening of competition. It is necessary to show in addition that this lessening is caused by voting or other like use of the stock to bring it about.

The inevitable consequences of the combination is not enough, nor is the elimination of competition enough; there must, in addition, be proof that the stock has been used to accomplish the elimination of competition. How the Government is ever going to prove that is more than I can imagine. This provision will legalize every trust and practically wipe the Sherman law off the statute books. If any existing trust does not consider itself quite safe under the first two paragraphs of this section, it can put on the armor furnished for its use in the third paragraph and laugh at the Attorney General and all his assistants. It may be argued that the Sherman antitrust law will still remain in force and that the acts I have mentioned would be forbidden by that law. This can not be claimed with any show of reason. If this bill becomes a law, it will become a legislative construction of the Sherman Act, and to the extent that the present law is inconsistent with this section 8 that law will be modified. It is true that repeals by implication are not favored, but the rule is that an act that covers in a comprehensive way any prior law repeals such prior law. Section 8 is clearly intended to lay down fully the law in regard to stock consolidations of corporations. It would be labor lost to argue to a court that the things Congress took pains not to prohibit by express exemption in the act are prohibited by some other law covering this subject in general terms. Paragraph 4 of this section may be cited as showing that section 8 does not apply to existing trusts; but a careful reading of that paragraph will show that its object is only to exempt the trusts from compliance with this section, so far as they may have any legal rights that this section may interfere with, but it is careful not to say that section 8 shall not legalize violations of the present law. What it does say is that if any legal rights that are reserved to it by this paragraph shall be held in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act such reservation shall not legalize this illegality.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I suppose that the gentleman has read the bill, on page 26, line 8—

> That nothing in this paragraph shall make stockholding relations between corporations legal when such relations constitute violations of the antitrust laws.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. WEBB. So it could not repeal the antitrust law?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think the gentleman will find that does not accomplish the purpose he imagines it will. I think when you come to read it carefully you will find that it is one of the most adroit things that was ever placed in any bill.

I want to call the gentleman's especial attention to the language of that section, because that is one of the things that surprised me when I came to read it. I read:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph—

Note that it says paragraph, not section—

> Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall make stockholding relations between corporations legal when such relations constitute violations of the antitrust laws.

This is the whole paragraph.

In other words, this paragraph reserves to the trusts any rights which might be threatened by the passage of this act, but it says that this reservation shall not be construed to legalize a trust, but it does not say that section 8 shall not legalize the trust. It does not take these corporations out of the operation of this act at all. On the other hand it expressly recognizes that this section applies to existing trusts. This paragraph only exempts our present trusts from its operation so far as it may be to their advantage to be exempted. I do not know who is responsible for this attack upon our antitrust laws. If my construction of this section is correct, this is certainly as smooth a piece of work as can well be imagined. I want to call your especial attention to the fact that though practically every other provision in this bill has met bitter hostility in the committee, not one voice has yet been raised against this provision. Why is it? Do you believe that the men interested in the trusts, sharp and shrewd as they are, would not have objected strenuously to this provision if it does not mean just what I claim that it means? [Applause.] This means immunity, and that is why they want it; that is why they are silent. The real object of these combinations is to lessen or destroy competition. It is for that purpose that nearly every industry is to-day in the hands of some holding company, some trust. Instead of repressing this evil, trusts are to be legalized and declared to be good trusts so long as the Government is unable to prove a thing which it will be impossible to prove, and no matter though they rob the public by high prices.

I do not believe that any set of men, whether engaged in a trust or not, should be given monopolistic powers. No one can be safely trusted with such powers. Those who drew and the courts that have enforced the Sherman Antitrust Act struck directly at this evil, at the combination, the conspiracy, the trust. They sought to destroy, not to legalize. They sought to reach the root of the evil, not its symptoms. Passing from this section, I will briefly refer to some other sections; I shall not touch on all of them, because I do not want to take up too much time. Sections 2 and 4 of the bill attempt to define offenses. These sections may have some value, though it is true that the acts condemned are offenses under existing law; but they are made offenses standing alone. When the courts have held such acts offenses it has been in connection with other matters, and it may be an advantage to have these acts made separate offenses; but at the same time there is great danger that the use of specific language to define an offense may lead our courts to the conclusion that anything of a like nature, but not covered by the language of the new act, was not intended to be covered, and as such is eliminated from the prohibitions of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Section 3 has been discussed somewhat upon this floor. It is my impression that section 3, which is the one to compel mining companies to sell generally to any responsible party, unless there is some good reason for refusing, might very properly be applied to any corporation. I do not believe that it should be applied to small corporations, but it seems to me that when a corporation gets so large that it handles a very large portion of the commerce of the country or the commerce of a section it might very properly be asked to deal equally and fairly without discrimination as between all the people. We ask this of common carriers. Why should not the same rule apply to any concern that is monopolistic in character?

Section 5 has been commented on by the chairman, and I think his comment is fair. I think that section may add quite a little to the remedy which private parties have in securing relief where they have been oppressed by unfair methods of competition. The same may be said of section 6, but that section is open to a very serious objection.

It makes the judgments that may be entered in suits brought by the Government to dissolve a trust, evidence not only in favor of but also against a person injured by a violation of the trust laws. In these days when judgments are entered by consent of parties without a public hearing, findings may not be of such a character as to serve a private party in recovering any claim he may have for injury to him. Upon what theory of justice a person who has never had his day in court to recover for injuries that may have ruined his business may be defeated by the action of an officer he can not control, and in a suit to which he is not a party is indeed strange. If this provision becomes a law, we shall have another sort of immunity bath and we may find the culprits seeking absolution at the hands of the Attorney General instead of dealing with their victims. Upon what theory a person can be deprived of his day in court I do not understand.

It seems to me when the Attorney General brings suit on behalf of all the people against a corporation and a judgment is recovered in favor of the Government against the trust, declaring that it is violating the law, it may very properly be used against that corporation if a suit is brought by a private party, but if for any reason the Attorney General fails to obtain a judgment, perhaps because he does not prosecute properly, it does not seem to me that a private party who may have been ruined by the conduct of some offending corporation should be debarred from ever suing that corporation for redress. We have a very conspicuous illustration as to how this may operate. The Government brought and lost a suit against the Sugar Trust. Subsequently the injured party, the sugar refinery at Philadelphia, recovered, I believe, more than a million dollars.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. CARLIN. How could that statement be true when that provision applies only to decrees or judgments? If there be no decree or judgment why neither party would be bound, so that the statement that the Government would fail to prosecute would have no application. There would have to be a final determination of the court.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I concede if no judgment was entered there would be no bar, but there may be a judgment of dismissal in the action, a judgment of no cause for action against the Government. If the judgment is entered against the Government it bars the suit of private parties who may even have commenced their actions years ago.

Mr. GORDON. Is not the degree of proof different in a suit for criminal action brought by the Government than in a suit brought by an individual?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, yes; but that does not make any difference so far as this section is concerned. A defendant convicted in a criminal action certainly could not complain that such a judgment should be binding upon him if binding in a civil suit, because more proof would be required in the criminal than in a civil suit.

Mr. GORDON. Exactly so; but a private individual who might want to bring the suit might complain, might he not?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is true.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Your judgment is, then, that this section should be stricken out entirely?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; my judgment is that the provision making the judgment in such a suit a bar against a suit brought by a private person should be stricken out.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would that be a fair proposition? Should not the rule, if it is applied at all, work both ways?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. One has been in court, and the other has not. The private party has not been in court at all. The trust has. He can not control the action of the Attorney General. He has no right to produce any evidence to sustain a decree. The Government may not have known about his evidence, or if it knew it, may not have produced it, and it may be, as in many instances it has been, simply a compromise judgment entered to settle some difficulty between the Government and the trust. It is not fair to make that sort of a judgment a bar to a private action.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. If this section is left in the bill, do you not feel and believe that this decree that is mentioned in this section should be the decree of the court of last resort—the Supreme Court of the land?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

Mr. McKENZIE. Should it not go that far?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I can see no reason why.

Mr. McKENZIE. You think it would be good policy to leave a matter of such great importance in the hands of an inferior court?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. It looks to me like this: We have been trying to enforce the Sherman Antitrust Act for 20 years, and trusts have been growing and growing; and I do not think that we need fear that the trusts are likely to be injured. They can comply with the laws like other law-abiding persons, and they need have no fear of these decrees.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am not sympathizing with the trusts at all. That is not the point. But in legislating I believe we should be fair, even to the trusts.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think that is fair. The first paragraph of the seventh section is of no particular importance. The latter half, however, allows railroad companies to get together and fix rates and make all sorts of arrangements to stifle competition except in a few unimportant matters. And this may be done without asking the permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission and without even notifying the commission of the agreement.

The railroads have clamored for this right for many years, but I presume it is right that they should share in the "New Freedom" somewhat. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Section 12 is the section under which trust magnates are going to be sent to jail. It does not add a thing in the world to the present law. Guilt, so far as the law is concerned, has been personal ever since the statute was written. It does not add anything to the penalty. It does not add anything in any other respect. It is simply put in there for buncombe. People have made stump speeches all about the country, threatening to put these people in jail. Anybody who has ever followed the prosecutions had under the Sherman antitrust law knows that individuals who participate in forming any illegal combination, any illegal conspiracy, can be punished now, and a number of them have been punished, though not very severely.

The trouble has been this, not that the law has not been upon the statute book, but that there has always been strong sympathy, both on the part of the jury and on the part of the court, for the men who have been carrying on these gigantic operations. They have all felt a little as though there was some virtue in these vast combinations, as though some of these men were a little bit too good to be put behind prison bars; and when they have been convicted the courts have shrunk from imposing the penalty which you men wrote into that law.

You have repeated it in this proposed statute. Do you think it will be any more effective now? Do you think anybody will have more respect for it now? I do not think so. When these same men appear before jurors and before courts there will be the same sympathy, there will be the same feeling, the same old plea, that these men did not know they had violated the law. They will say, "We guess we will let them go this time"; and they will be good hereafter.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do.

Mr. FESS. I did not know that the Sherman antitrust law provided that if the corporation was found guilty of violating the law, that guilt would also be deemed to apply to the directors.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This section does not say that or mean that. It simply says if they have been guilty of any of the acts defined in the Sherman Antitrust Act they shall be punished by a fine of $5,000.

Mr. FESS. The offense shall also be deemed to be that of the individual director of such a corporation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Read a little further.

Mr. FESS. I read:

> And upon the conviction of the corporation any director, officer, or agent who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of such prohibited acts shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is exactly what the present law provides for, only in slightly different language.

Mr. FESS. Does it mean that that law is simply to cover up something else?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The fact that the corporation has been convicted does not prove that the particular individual is guilty.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The first part of the section is merely a catch phrase, which sounds well but has no effect whatever?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is true.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The binding part of it is in the latter part?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. There were submitted before the Committee on the Judiciary indictments for the purpose of showing how parties had been charged with the violation of the existing trust law. No one familiar with the drawing of indictments or who had any experience with prosecutions under criminal law can have any doubt that it is simply a repetition of the present statute. It is just couched in different language; that is all.

Now, let me say that while you may point with pride to this section 12 as the performance of a promise, let me remind my Democratic friends that there is very little in this trust program to carry out the promises so bravely made in the last Democratic platform.

How about holding companies? You have legalized them. In your platform you said that holding companies were "indefensible." You do not say that now.

You condemned interlocking directors. You have to some extent done that in this bill, but at the same time you have also legalized interlocking directors.

You also condemned watered stock. It is true you have a bill here for the purpose of preventing railroads from issuing watered stock, but other industrial corporations may float oceans of it. There is not a single scratch in any of these bills against the watered stock of a company like the United States Steel Corporation or any of the other larger combinations of capital.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do you not recognize any difference between the public necessity for limiting the issues of stocks and bonds of railroad corporations and those of purely private corporations?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is some difference, but do you mean to say that it is proper to have watered stock to the extent found in the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. GORDON. The people of the United States do not pay any dividends on the stock of private corporations. They do pay dividends on the stock of public corporations, like railroad corporations. There is the difference.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. One of the main objects in these consolidations has been to inject watered stock——

Mr. GORDON. Unquestionably.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The very consolidations that your bill legalizes will invite it, and you will have more watered stock under this scheme as the years go by if you ever write it into law; but you will never dare to do it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield just a minute further?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The point I sought to draw the gentleman out on was the legal relation of the railroad corporations to the public, to wit, that the railroads are entitled to a reasonable compensation for drawing the traffic of the country over public highways.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Can not the gentleman see the public necessity for limiting and restricting the stock and bond issues of the railroad corporations, so as to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to some extent to know how much money was actually invested in those corporations?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think I had the honor to introduce the first bill on that subject that was ever introduced into this House. It was introduced six or eight years ago. I called President Roosevelt's attention to it, and he promised to send a message to Congress asking for its passage. I think in every general message that he wrote after that time he called the attention of this House and of Congress to the need for legislation of that kind, and I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea of preventing watered stock so far as railroad corporations are concerned, but it seems to me that some day we shall have to go further than that. It seems to me that these vast combinations that practically dominate whole industries must in some fashion be controlled; and it seems to me the financing of such institutions is one of the things we must control. An overcapitalized corporation must try to secure monopolistic powers or it can not compete with a competitor that is honestly financed. One of the reasons why this country is almost on the verge of ruin to-day is the fact that we have got all sorts of watered stock, all sorts of inflated capitalization which makes the conditions unsound and unsafe. If it were not for the effort to pay dividends upon such stocks there would not be the necessity for the high cost of living of which we are complaining.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Upon what basis was this $700,000,000 of watered stock issued by the Steel Corporation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have not been advised.

Mr. BAILEY. Was it not issued upon the tremendous power which was conferred upon that corporation by the United States Congress, when it gave that corporation an immense margin of profit through the protective tariff? Was it not a capitalization of the protective tariff law, which gave it that enormous opportunity for profit.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not going to discuss the tariff at this time.

Mr. BAILEY. And is not the repeal of that protective tariff law the thing which has put down the common stock of the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not know whether the tariff has affected this company or not, but I do know that a company trying to maintain any credit and pay dividends on the ocean of water that was put into capitalization is in sore straits.

Mr BAILEY. It certainly brought it up to an artificial level.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Gentlemen, I have spoken a good deal longer than I intended to speak. I wanted to call attention to these things because I think them important.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if it is his opinion that this bill emasculates the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think it practically destroys it.

Mr. FERRIS. It is not sufficiently drastic; is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. I think most of the provisions in the bill are of very doubtful value. There are some which I approve, but section 8, the one that deals with trusts, certainly does legalize trusts.

Mr. FERRIS. How does the gentleman stand on the labor amendment soon to be offered?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have not discussed the labor question, but I will tell the gentleman my position. I do not believe in exempting any class. I believe that before the law we ought all be equal. I do not think that we should exempt any special class. I may explain my views more fully on that at another time.

Allow me to thank the committee for its kind attention. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman from Minnesota occupy some more of his time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, those accepting responsibility as Representatives should not treat lightly the duties which go with such responsibility. We can not afford, when acting the rôle of statesmanship, whether with great or small capacity, to proceed impulsively or rashly or hastily. True statesmanship consists in a large percentage of deliberation and a very small percentage of action.

What, then, shall be said of a measure reaching into the very vitals of every industrial and commercial enterprise in the Nation, from the railroad systems, whose lines extend thousands of miles, and the banks, whose affairs are the direct interest of all, down through all gradations to the smallest—a measure introduced in January, discussed in committee superficially and spasmodically, and reported the first week in May?

The pending bill not only regulates the managements of carriers and the directorates of 350,000 corporations, including banks, but touches the private affairs and contractual relations of every citizen. It prescribes new and untried methods of carrying on private business, breaking up and displacing those which, having stood the test of experience, are normal and acceptable to all. The sum total of the country's business transacted in conformity to existing rules and methods is incalculable. The billions representing bank clearances do not tell half the story.

Who are those who, after a few weeks consideration, with constant interruptions due to other important legislation coming up, have recommended to this body a voluminous code of business morality? Are our colleagues on the Judiciary Committee mechanical engineers or experts in finance, manufacturing, and transportation? Can they exhibit credentials or diplomas which justify our confidence in their familiarity with all science and all human affairs? Are they better fitted to build and equip railways, steamships, engines, and cars, or to operate them by the application of steam and electricity, than those now so employed? Should we now, after such a brief schooling, take their word for it that it is a crime if a man owns stock in two corporations or is a director in both, or as a producer sells to A at a certain profit, while selling to B at a greater or less profit, or sells a customer an article at a dollar and offers it to him at 90 cents on condition that he be given the customer's continuous orders? Even if I thought I could ever be convinced of the wisdom and justice of such changes by statute I would require better authority and more competent witnesses than the estimable gentlemen who have joined in a favorable report on this bill, for however sound their judgment in legal matters, however successful they have been as politicians, I can not believe they have been able in four short months to master the intricacies of the 10,000 branches of business affected by this legislation, or to give convincing sociological reasons for severing the close relations that men have built on mutual confidence in dealings running through the years, and decades of activity. We are no more justified in accepting their judgments, so contrary to common knowledge and experience, than the railroads of the country would be if they employed at a princely salary some brilliant theorist and doctrinaire who asserted that he could show them where and how to save a million dollars a day.

Before entering upon the separate provisions of the bill I wish to call attention to the short period of hopeful feeling and renewal of confidence in the business world between the presidential deliverance on the 19th of January and the publication of the so-called "tentative bills" early in February—or, rather, to the deliverance itself—in order to emphasize the wide divergence between promise and performance.

The President said in his message that—

> Constructive legislation is always the embodiment of convincing experience and of the mature public opinion which finally springs out of that experience.

He further said:

> What we are purposing to do, therefore, is happily not to hamper or interfere with business, as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. * * * And fortunately no measures of sweeping or novel change are necessary; * * * what we have to do can be done in a new spirit, in thoughtful moderation, and without revolution of any untoward kind.

If it could be shown that there was a widespread or even any considerable demand for this legislation, still it would well become us, in view of its drastic character, to pause and consider until senseless clamor raised by the few mad and restless innovators who have prompted it had reduced their temperatures.

But, in sober truth, it has been concocted and sprung so unexpectedly, so suddenly, and demand or reason for it is so utterly wanting, that the action of the majority can only be accounted for upon the theory of supposed political advantage. If that theory be correct, then, however mistaken the Democratic opinion upon the political effect, no one will doubt the desperate nature of the emergency. The new tariff act has failed to reduce the cost of living, as was promised; the new currency act has not accelerated the wheels of industry, as was expected; hence this sudden tactical shift. The conciliatory message has been whispered into limbo in select presidential conclaves, and the dogs of war have been unleashed to tear and cripple the fabric of business and industrial life in its essence and structure to satisfy the clamor of the malcontents within the party. I again ask, Where and by whom and by how many is such legislation desired? It is a question that can not be answered, or if at all not satisfactorily, by naming shallow-pated doctrinaires and partisan opportunists.

Now, if I were seeking merely political advantage, my true interest would be to remain silent instead of giving such free expressions of my views as I propose giving. But the measure is so drastic, so immature, so untimely, so utterly ruinous, that, in order to save the country from the confusion and destruction it would produce, I am perfectly willing, if within my power, to persuade Democrats to refrain from supporting it in their own party interests, even if from no higher considerations. And although the practice of keeping party pledges has been recently obsoleted, I will first make a few comparisons between certain planks in the platform on which the President and Democratic Members of this Congress were elected and some of the provisions of this bill.

The most important declaration on the subject was in these words:

> We regret that the Sherman antitrust law has received a judicial construction depriving it of much of its efficacy, and we favor the enactment of legislation which will restore to the statute the strength of which it has been deprived by such interpretation.

It will be noted that the uncertainty created by the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Co. cases was the inspiration for that declaration. Can anyone point out in this bill a line or word intended or calculated to change the interpretation of the law there given by the court? The challenge may stand throughout this debate, and no one will attempt to meet it. The eloquent gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] introduced a bill at the opening of this session which had the specific effect to change the law to mean what it meant, or was supposed to mean, prior to these decisions. He was accorded a hearing before the committee on his bill, but his bill went, along with his brilliant appeal, into the committee's capacious wastebasket. Nor is there even the vestige of anything in the bill embodying his idea, or any response whatever to the platform declaration and party pledge. I do not, of course, complain of this. I merely call attention to the fact.

I have already predicted confusion and uncertainty to result from this measure, if passed, and will presently discuss specific provisions in detail. But lest it be claimed that the various provisions of the bill have a combined effect to remove the uncertainty created by the court decisions, I call attention to the fact that the majority does not make any such claim, and no one will dare attempt, candidly and in good faith, to argue that any provision touches the subject matter of the court decisions or the party pledge based thereon.

I will now dispose of one or two items, as to which I make no complaint that the bill fulfills party pledges or interferes with the country's business; matters wherein the bill is merely a pretentious show of meeting platform pledges without substantial performance. The platform was profuse and explicit in its pledges to labor. It said:

> RIGHTS OF LABOR.
> We repeat our declarations of the platform of 1908, as follows:
>
> "Questions of judicial practice have arisen, especially in connection with industrial disputes. We believe that the parties to all judicial proceedings should be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any case in which an injunction would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved."

I call attention to the fact that in no message or official deliverance from the White House is there a line or syllable with reference to that pledge. I state emphatically, and propose making it so clear that even the blindest and most credulous partisan can not refuse to admit it, that the bill is an absolute failure, not only to accomplish what labor expected to be and claimed should be done, but accomplishes nothing whatever for labor's benefit.

First, as to what labor expected and had a right to expect. It will be noted that every word in the 1912 platform is a reiteration between quotation marks of the 1908 platform. In the 1908 campaign Mr Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, was exceedingly active in support of Bryan, and positively asserted in his speeches, as doubtless did his associates, that the platform was an indorsement and approval of the Pearre bill. That bill had received the unanimous support of Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee of the House during two years prior to the 1908 convention. Mr. Gompers also claimed that his interpretation of the platform was in accord with the views of Mr. Bryan and other Democratic leaders. About 10 days before the election in 1908 President Roosevelt, in a public statement, called attention to Mr. Gompers's statements, and challenged Mr. Bryan to admit or deny them. But Mr. Bryan was silent until Gompers had answered reiterating his prior assertions. Then Bryan stated that Roosevelt had been already answered. That the 1912 platform pledged approval of the Pearre bill is shown by the fact that after this construction of the 1908 platform by both Gompers and Bryan its language was followed and quoted, word for word, in 1912. Moreover, Gompers strenuously urged that interpretation before the Judiciary Committee, both prior to and since the presidential election of 1912, and neither Bryan nor any member of the committee, nor President Wilson, nor any other Democratic officer, has thus far differed with him.

Now, compare the provisions of the Pearre bill and the sections of this bill treating of injunctions in labor cases. I am not, of course, understood as approving the Pearre bill; in fact, I still have great confidence in the courts. But here are the provisions of the Pearre bill:

A bill to regulate the issuance of restraining orders and injunctions and procedure thereon, and to limit the meaning of "conspiracy" in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and an employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed to labor and persons seeking employment as laborers, or between persons seeking employment as laborers, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law; and such property or property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his, her, or its agent or attorney. And for the purposes of this act no right to continue the relation of employer and employee or to assume or create such relation with any particular person or persons, or at all, or to carry on business of any particular kind or at any particular place, or at all, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as property or as constituting a property right.

SEC. 2. That in cases arising in the courts of the United States or coming before said courts, or before any judge or the judges thereof, no agreement between two or more persons concerning the terms or conditions of employment of labor, or the assumption or creation or termination of any relation between employer and employee, or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done with reference to or involving or growing out of a labor dispute shall constitute a conspiracy or other criminal offense or be punished or prosecuted as such unless the act or thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be unlawful if done by a single individual, nor shall the entering into or the carrying out of any such agreement be restrained or enjoined unless such act or thing agreed to be done would be subject to be restrained or enjoined under the provisions, limitations, and definition contained in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

These provisions fully justified Mr. Gompers and his followers in their support of the Democratic ticket, according to their faith in the party pledges, if the subject of injunction in labor disputes was as important as claimed by them.

It will be observed that the Pearre bill entirely eliminates "the right to carry on business at any particular place or at all" from the category of property entitled to protection by injunction. You seek in vain for anything of that kind in this bill. The Pearre bill also had the effect to exempt labor from legal liability and from the injunctive process under the Sherman Antitrust Act in boycott cases. If the words of the second section, above quoted, do not mean that, then they mean nothing.

The claim in the committee's majority report that the so-called exemption clause for unions exempts anybody from any legal danger or interference is the rankest nonsense. It embodies a legal proposition never disputed by any court nor by any respectable authority.

And with respect to the so-called anti-injunction provisions of the bill, I start confidently with the assertion that if labor fully knows its rights and dares assert them, in keeping with its oft-expressed views of judicial power, it will be as much aroused in opposition to this bill as are all the intelligent business men of the Nation.

While having no fear that the courts would abuse the extensive new and arbitrary powers conferred by this bill, I am not deterred by that fact from calling attention to them. I am convinced, however, that our judges have not asked for and do not desire thrust upon them these arbitrary powers. I now quote from section 15 a sentence containing the gist of the whole section, which I deem it necessary to notice:

No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party, unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to property or a property right of the applicant before notice could be served or hearing had thereon.

If a statute said, "You shall not go into the street without your clothes on except to save some one from injury," I take it that such a statute would not deprive one of the privilege of wearing clothes on the street when not engaged in rescuing persons from injury. Surely no one would be so foolish as to insist that it did. Here the courts are forbidden to restrain parties without notice, except in the instance specified. Would it be possible to more clearly authorize them to issue restraining orders in any other cases they may see fit, and under all other circumstances which to them may appear to justify it, provided notice be given? I am no lawyer, and yet I would be ashamed to confess my inability to deduce from this language unlimited new authority to the courts to issue restraining orders at will upon notice.

The only limitation imposed is that, where no property or property right is involved, the ceremony of giving a notice, which may be one day's notice, must be observed. An examination of subsequent parts of the bill convinces me that this far-reaching effect of the language employed was not merely accidental, but had a definite purpose, which we discover when we read section 18.

Being a mere layman, I hesitated giving my own construction to section 18 until I had submitted it to legal Members of the House and found their views to accord with my own. The section is arranged in two paragraphs, possibly with a view to making it a little more difficult to discover how narrow and restricted the ground from which the courts are excluded. I find I can not make my points entirely clear without quoting the whole section. It reads as follows:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

It will be observed that the section is inoperative until a case has been brought, and the case must be between persons holding certain relations; and not only so, it must be pending while the relation exists. It is important to note that property or a property right must be involved. Hence it would never apply in the rare event of an action between employees or between persons employed and those seeking employment. It is therefore limited to cases between employer and employees. But that relation terminates the moment a strike or lockout occurs. Would it ever apply in cases of strikes or boycotts? Do employees eat their cake and keep it, too? In other words, do they strike and yet keep right along at work? And is there an instance to be found of employees boycotting an employer while serving him? Such a thing may be possible but is unprecedented. Again, do persons employed and those seeking employment boycott or declare strikes against each other? Of course such a thing is inconceivable.

Now, when you have eliminated strike and boycott cases, I would like some one to point out any jurisdiction remaining for the operation of the prohibition worthy of mention. And to see that all in the second paragraph is brought within the narrow confines of the first, I call attention to the fact that it says, in the first line of the second paragraph, "and no such restraining order or injunction," and so forth. That obviously refers to those restricted with respect to relations and subject of litigation in the preceding paragraph. Any persuasion or withholding of patronage or assembling, however "peaceful" and "lawful," must, in order to come within the exemption, involve parties in a case standing in these relations, and the action must be one brought to protect property or property rights from irreparable injury. Suppose it be an action brought for a restraining order not involving property, but upon notice, as clearly it may be, under the provision of section 15, read in connection with the first paragraph of section 18. It is absurd to suppose the author of the bill and the committee intended that the courts should be bereft of jurisdiction in cases of violence, disorder, and trespass, in all that larger and more important class of cases where the relation of employer and employee never existed or has been severed by a strike. I do not accuse it of having done anything so foolish. And that is just where it misleads such of labor's representatives as believe that to have been done. If they believe the law is objectionable as it stands to-day, they will soon find that this act is much more amenable to the same grounds of objection.

Whether labor is entitled to have the jurisdiction of the courts regulated and limited is a question not before us, because if it were conceded that labor is entitled to legislation of that character, no bill containing it is before us, and the issue is not raised by this bill.

That some one representing labor is not satisfied with the bill in its present shape appears from the fact that marked copies have been laid upon the desks of Members by the American Federation of Labor. The suggested amendment to section 18 is a mere addition of these words, "nor shall any of the acts enumerated in this paragraph be considered unlawful in any court of the United States." It was stated in the New York World of May 2 that labor's representatives had been told at the White House that if that addition were made it would be clearly unconstitutional. Though the President may have missed the mark on other occasions, he is undoubtedly correct about this. I do not claim to know much constitutional law, but I know enough to know that, as Congress would here be attempting to direct the judicial department in the construction of statutes, which is a judicial and not a legislative function, it would be contrary to both the form and spirit of the Constitution.

I can not help marveling at the present subserviency of our friend Gompers and his associates. I have not forgotten his and their splendid show of courage and consistency at the first session of the Sixty-second Congress; how they took their stand for the Bacon-Bartlett bill, containing substantially the provisions of the Pearre bill, and even more; got it reported from the Labor Committee, whose chairman, W. B. Wilson, now officiates and luxuriates at the head of the Department of Labor; how the chairman of the Judiciary Committee found himself unable to control Mr. Wilson, but did succeed in controlling the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] so far as to prevent the report of a special rule for the consideration of the bill. Now, I shall be very much surprised if the American Federation of Labor and its friends on this floor so far stultify themselves and disappoint their followers as to accept so miserable a makeshift, so utterly ruinous a measure as that embodied in sections 15 and 18.

I would like to give some attention to the contempt provisions, which are, if possible, more objectionable than the other, but find so much of my time exhausted that I must devote the balance to the other provisions of the bill.

Section 2 of the pending bill reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall either directly or indirectly discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections or communities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, with the purpose or intent to thereby destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

The best that can be said for it is that from the moment of its passage and approval it would become and remain a dead letter and a mere encumbrance of the statute books. But it would at least cause doubts, fears, and uncertainty in the business mind. In a broad sense every sale that is made injures and is intended to injure a competitor, because the mere fact of a sale by A deprives B and other dealers of an opportunity to make a sale. But the prohibition is surrounded by so many loopholes for escape, provisos, and exceptions, practically covering some condition of every sale, that the jargon means very little. Its presence in the bill can only be accounted for upon the theory that persons are still living who were injured by evil practices of the Standard Oil Co. at a former period, and these have been sufficiently influential to have inserted in a bill affecting nearly all business this useless, confusing provision. The answer under any charge of a violation to the question of why the sale was made would be that the sale was made in order to make the sale. Or the accused party could say he got the business while in the act of getting it, or that he did the business in due course of doing business. He could answer in either of these meaningless ways and so put an end to any case brought under that section.

I pass now to section 4. In a general sense it forbids exclusive contracts.

If it were possible, I would like to ascertain just how much those who inspired or dictated that provision know about the established and normal course of the world's business of to-day. It is a fact well known to business men that the exclusive contracts here condemned and penalized characterize about three-fourths of the productive and mercantile business worth doing at all, and the balance would be done by the same methods if it were practicable.

Upon reading the hearings before the committee an impression is obtained that the only persons in the country who can possibly be injured by what the committee condemns as an exclusive contract is the small or crossroads merchant. Even if I admitted, which I do not, that his prosperity would be promoted by the elimination of exclusive contracts, still it would be just as absurd and unwise to do so as to burn a barn or sink a ship in order to get rid of rats.

Let me illustrate how the exclusive contract is operated. Mr. A, we will suppose, manufactures a special grade of men's underwear, from certain kinds of wool and cotton, taken in given proportions and combinations. Of course, there may be a dozen or hundred others making other brands which are better or just as good at the same price or slightly inferior at a much lower price. Now, at the beginning of the year A does not know whether his trade will amount to $50,000 or $100,000, so he goes to Smith & Co., wholesalers or jobbers, who are vast distributors, and arranges with them that they will take his entire output or surplus, after he has supplied his retail customers, off his hands at the end of each three months at a certain fixed price, provided he does not produce an annual excess of $100,000. They also bind themselves mutually that Smith & Co. shall not buy that class and grade of goods from anyone else, except to meet a demand in excess of A's supply, and that A shall not offer his surplus to anyone else.

Now, I am prepared to point out the advantages of that arrangement to the immediate parties. A knows for a year ahead just how much raw material to obtain, how many operatives to employ, how much the aggregate cost and the cost per unit, how much his profit on each unit of production, and, in the aggregate, just how much money to borrow and when to promise repayment. His employees are secure in their jobs for the entire year or during good behavior. Smith & Co. can calculate their profits per unit in advance, and can make similar exclusive contracts with retailers throughout the country and at a lower price than if all were left to chance, fancy, and the interference of competitors. And the same certainty, safety, and security is created in their establishment in the matter of employees, organization, expenses, and so forth, as in A's. All of which, as anyone can see, also makes for economy and lower prices.

How does it affect other producers and dealers? Using alphabetical representation, we have, say, makers of underwear down to J who are able to make these exclusive contracts, and they make them with as many different general distributors. They are in competition with each other up to the point of making the contracts and continuing in local competition, and their respective brands continue to compete with each other everywhere.

But below J are K, L, M, and so forth, in the same line of production, competing with all above and among themselves, but unable to arrange exclusive contracts. And there can be no doubt of ample competition between the distributors handling the various brands.

I now take up the case of the crossroads or village storekeeper, who is about the only party thought by the committee to be worthy of consideration. His opportunities in the city's marts are indeed restricted; but that is the least of his disadvantages. His customers usually buy on credit, so that he is unable to turn over his capital more than once or twice a year. He has long seasons of depression and short seasons of excessive activity. But he always enjoys at least two options. He may enter into the exclusive contract, so limiting his commitment as to remain on the safe side, and then supply deficiencies from K, L, M, and so forth, or he may reject the exclusive contract and do all his business with the latter. If he and his customers must pay a little more than the denizens of the city or large town, that is only one of the inconveniences of rural life. In truth, however, the rural dweller enjoys to a large extent all the benefits of a world-wide competition.

I would like to portray some of the exclusive advantages of residence remote from the throngs, activities, and distractions of city life, but lack of time forbids. Instead of deploring the lot of such dwellers, I have always been inclined to envy them their normal, simple lives; their undisturbed sanity, serenity, and security.

The country merchant suffers more from the competition of mail-order houses than from the causes assigned by the committee. But what are you going to do about that? Will you take away from his customers their postal facilities? That would be just as nonsensical as to disintegrate for their benefit the delicate structure of the country's business, founded on years and decades of varied and shifting experience, thereby restoring waste, deceit, cheating, higher prices, bankruptcies, and other evils of unrestrained and unregulated competition. And from these evils by far the greater sufferers are residents in the country.

The section also strikes at leases, denying the manufacturers of special machines and patented articles the privilege of leasing and selling them on restrictive conditions. I will endeavor to illustrate with a great business institution against which no prejudice appears in the report. The two cases referred to by the committee appear to have been aggravated cases. But even there not the slightest injury to consumers or users was shown or even asserted. They were instances of disputes between rivals in business. Let us take for illustration a business in which a large number of men doing considerable business are interested. A great plant at West Orange, N. J., manufactures and sells or leases thousands of storage batteries used in autocars and autotrucks. The convenience and economy resulting to individuals from using these and dispensing with horses and wagons it would be difficult to estimate, to say nothing of the diminished wear and tear of vehicles and streets and interlocked wheels. Storage batteries require supervision, cleaning, and more or less scientific care. It would be a great loss both to the manufacturer and user to make outright sales and allow them to go beyond the control of the former. So, necessarily, in most cases that company uses the leasing form of agreement, carrying with it a guaranty for a number of years, with the cost of all services to keep in perfect condition covered in the leasing price. But it would be impracticable to use the batteries without containers; and the expense of keeping in condition would be greatly enhanced if the batteries were used, as after a fashion they could be, with containers made by others than those who scientifically construct them for that company and nicely adjust them to the batteries. So when a battery is leased the lessee is required to purchase a container made by the company and must bind himself not to use any made by anyone else. The container is sold at actual cost and at a price no higher than that of others in the market, considering its superior excellence. Now, who will have the hardihood to question the right of that company to do business in that form which in the end makes for economy and profit to both parties? And that is but one of thousands of such illustrations that could be given.

But if this bill should pass with that fourth section retained in it, that company would hereafter have to make outright sales of the batteries, in which case they would soon get out of condition and be peddled about as secondhand articles or go into the junk heap, to the discredit and ruin of its business, because they could no longer couple their leases with conditions as to exclusive use of their containers, without which they must sell rather than lease the batteries.

The same condition is found in many branches of the automobile business. Handy mechanical contrivances which are not, as it is said, fool proof are leased and guaranteed. But the owners of such patents find that there is no profit in their manufacture and sale unless they can not only retain supervision through leases but also sell the lessees other parts that go with the patented part and place a prohibition upon the use of these other parts made by others.

It was shown before the Judiciary Committee at its hearings in 1912 that the business in this country which would be affected by such legislation amounts to the enormous annual sum of $25,000,000,000. A loss of even 1 per cent of that vast sum inflicted "by act of Congress" would be $250,000,000. How would that loss be compensated? Who would be the gainers? Suppose such great establishments as those manufacturing storage batteries and the great automobile factories were broken up and put out of business, who would profit by it? It would be found unprofitable for their successors, even if any would be found possessed of sufficient capital and brains to do the business in any other way and survive. In such institutions you must have cooperation and coordination of many departments and machines, and if only one company in the country has had the brains, enterprise, and foresight to assemble them into effective working relations, then that company will have a monopoly. The question is not at all whether a monopoly is desirable. If that were the question, no one would be readier with a negative answer than I. But the question is whether it is not better to endure a few monopolies, especially when it is not shown that their charges for service are unreasonable, than make a disastrous attempt to put them out of business at the behest of disgruntled agitators and wreckers.

I have already noticed the first paragraph of section 7. I will now call attention to the second paragraph of the same section, which reads as follows:

Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all such matters shall continue to be subject to such jurisdiction of the commission, and all such agreements shall be entered and kept of record by the carriers, parties thereto, and shall at all times be open to inspection by the commission: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying existing laws prohibiting the pooling of earnings or traffic, or existing laws against joint agreements by common carriers to maintain rates.

Need I emphasize the far-reaching effect of what I have just read?

Heretofore when such legislation was offered it did not extend to operating and accounting officers, nor did it authorize, as does this provision, the formation of permanent associations with memberships composed of the officers of rival railroad companies. It will be noted that this would enable the railroads to completely forestall all the activities and functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It would cover not only rates, but every form of service to the public and fiscal affairs. Skillfully the draftsman has left with the commission supervision not of the agreements, mind you, but of the matters forming the subject matters of the agreements. But care is taken not to confer on the commission any control over the terms of such agreements, nor of practices under them, those being here legalized.

[The time of Mr. MADDEN having expired, he was yielded an additional 15 minutes.]

Mr. MADDEN. Such an enactment would thwart every effort of the commission and render its continued existence not worth while. If that were all, the public would be but slightly worse off than with the present slack-twisted pretense of rate regulation. But the prohibition of the antitrust act, the only barrier between the people and tyrannical, unrestrained monopolies of transportation, would be removed.

Many here will remember the persistent but heretofore unsuccessful efforts to have Congress exempt traffic agreements from the antitrust act. Here we have it in a more dangerous form than ever before presented. I trust that in this House, where on my motion, nearly four years ago, a much less dangerous form of the same exemption was stricken out of the amendatory act of 1910 by an overwhelming majority, it is only necessary to call attention to it. If I had thought there was the slightest probability of this Congress passing any such provision, I would have devoted most of the time allotted me to this clause of section 7. But surely the debates of four years ago, running through days and weeks, and the unanswerable reasons then urged against such legislation, have not been forgotten or lost their force.

Without intending to question the good faith of the committee, unless the facts constitute a reflection on it, I call attention to the bill as given to the public on Saturday, May 2. That bill contained no provision on the subject. Nor did the press of the country or the public have any hint that the bill would contain any such provision, until the committee made its report on May 6.

I was humbly born and I know what it is to toil; and I have always taken pride in being just on an equal plane of privilege with my fellow man, neither above nor below him, having no other feeling than scorn and contempt for any who would be above the law, while others are within it. I know of no more distinctive or important, nor any safer, American doctrine than equality before the law. If a statute is not to stand against all, let it be repealed; and if it is not to be enforced against all, let the officers of the law declare an intention to refuse its enforcement in any and every case.

I can not give time to a full discussion of section 8, containing, among others, several important provisions pertaining to railroad finance, including stock and bond deals. All of it would appear to be entirely far-fetched and out of place in a bill dealing with the antitrust laws. Within much cunning phraseology are embraced in it all the vices of the Townsend-Elkins bill of the Sixty-first Congress, a bill which was finally defeated—at least, as to all these provisions. Here again it bobs up serenely, occupying more than two pages of this bill, without discussion before the committee, without notice to or knowledge of anyone except those in the sacred inner circles of the committee room.

Notwithstanding the fact that the ownership by public-service corporations of the stocks of other public-service corporations was always denied when the issue was made before the courts, and notwithstanding that Congress has heretofore steadfastly refused to sanction it, the successive heads of the Department of Justice have winked at and condoned it and given effect to such acquisitions in actions under the antitrust act. I see in the provisions of section 8 an attempt to consummate in legislation the derelictions and evil practices of the Attorneys General. It is here attempted in the deceptive form of prohibitions with provisos and limitations. "Hereafter you shall not steal a sheep; provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent your stealing a lamb." We are expected to close our minds to the fact that in a short time the lamb will become a sheep.

I feel so confident, with respect to the disposal by the House of section 8, that I will also refrain from discussing that section at length. But lest the brevity of my comment upon it mislead some one and make an impression that the closing paragraph of section 7 and all of section 8 are of comparatively slight importance, I appeal to every Member to give them careful and serious attention. Certain leading newspapers have been of late teeming with charges that the railroads have captured all the works at Washington under this administration. I make no such charge, but state the obvious truth that their power must be great, indeed, not only here in Congress, but also with the Chief Executive, if they are able to "put over" on the people any such legislation as is here proposed.

A vast conspiracy to promote railroad interests above all others in the conduct of this administration, intrigue, and the artificial creation of public opinion have been freely charged in some of the newspapers and elsewhere. Much evidence intended to establish the truth of these charges has become a matter of record in a coordinate body. In order to complete the record, I call attention to one or two additional facts: Double dealing on the part of the attorney chosen by the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose majority were appointed by President Wilson, was definitely and circumstantially charged last week by an attorney representing large associations of shippers and no less than seven sovereign States. An Associated Press news item appeared at the time reading as follows:

THORNE ASSAILS BRANDEIS—SAYS HIS OPINION ON RATE ADVANCE WAS NOT SUPPORTED BY FACTS.

WASHINGTON, May 7.

The Interstate Commerce Commission had before it to-day a supplementary brief filed by Clifford Thorne, representing the western railroad commissions before that body in the advanced-rate case, in which he bitterly arraigns Louis D. Brandeis, special counsel for the commission, who, in his closing argument in the case last Friday, stated that "on the whole, the net income, the net operating revenues, of the carriers in official classification territory are smaller than is consistent with their assured prosperity and the welfare of the community."

Mr. Thorne asserts that Mr. Brandeis commenced his argument before the commission "by conceding the position of the carriers." On behalf of those whom he represents Mr. Thorne says that he "repudiates in unqualified terms" the concession made by Mr. Brandeis in his closing argument. In so far as Mr. Brandeis's opinion is not supported by substantial reasons the commission should not give any weight to it.

Mr. Thorne then refers to the "unpardonable" attack of Mr. Brandeis on the surplus he [Mr. Thorne] had allowed.

"The surplus to which Mr. Brandeis applied the epithet 'niggardly,'" he says, "was precisely the surplus adopted, after careful and deliberate consideration, by the unanimous action of the commission in the former advanced-rate cases. Mr. Brandeis attempts to brand that surplus as 'niggardly' without giving the slightest argument, reason, or fact in support of his claim. Some of the companies are earning more than 20 per cent after all other charges are paid. Not a word appears throughout the entire brief or in oral argument in favor of reducing their surplus earnings."

Mr. Thorne adds that the commission can not hold the revenues of the carriers affected inadequate unless it reverses the principles established in its former opinions.

I am merely availing myself of this opportunity to call the matter to the attention of the House. When so serious a charge is made by responsible authority, where so much is involved, so well calculated, if believed, to discredit that important executive branch, it is the duty of the legislative department, whose will it is the duty of the commission to faithfully interpret, to learn whether the charge be founded in fact or unfounded.

Section 8 and sections following it are of such considerable length that I shall not read them into the RECORD.

And I shall only discuss one other section, and that briefly. Section 9, filling four pages of the bill, contains provisions in detail concerning directorates in private corporations and the qualifications of directors. The principal reason assigned by the committee for embarking Congress upon this unexplored sea of legislation reads as follows:

As the President has well said in his message, the adoption of the provisions of this section will bring new men, new energies, new spirit of initiative, and new blood into the management of our business enterprises. It will open the field of industrial development and origination to scores of men who have been obliged to serve when their abilities entitled them to direct. It will immensely hearten the young men coming on and will greatly enrich the business activities of the whole country.

In the days of Jackson the slogan of the party was, "To the victors belong the spoils." At a later period, a cardinal political theory was that there should be frequent rotations in public office. But never until the "New Freedom" was handed down to us did any one suggest that the Government should extend its powers to compelling rotation in places of private trust and confidence.

If the proposed regulation of directorates does not belong to the same category of political clap-trap as do other parts of the bill, at any rate in so far as it is not already covered by the Sherman Antitrust Act, when faithfully enforced, it is utterly abortive, because beyond Federal control. I need not elaborate this proposition, since others will be able to do so more clearly than I could, but it seems to me almost too obvious to require elucidation. Where the laws of a State have prescribed the qualifications for directors and defined the voting rights of stockholders in corporations of their own creation, what right has the Federal Government to interfere? But enormous wrong can be done and irreparable injury inflicted by an unconstitutional enactment before its invalidity can be established through a tedious course of litigation.

Probably a quarter million corporations, transacting the larger percentage of the country's business, would be affected by such legislation in their most vital parts—that is to say, at their heads. The rage for innovation and disruption is not satiated by tearing down and mutilating beyond all hope of repair the country's business fabric, but, giving free rein to the mania for capricious readjustment, the whole structure and system of corporate management is to be arbitrarily shifted. It is to be taken out of the hands of those who have been tried and found efficient and trustworthy; those who have invested their fortunes in the business and grown up with it. Those who were the choice of the stockholders are to be displaced and the business placed in new hands, intrusted to those who know nothing of corporate management, and are untested as to character and capacity. Nor is this new deal in directorates and business control limited to manufacturing and trading companies. Even banks of all kinds, including savings banks and trust companies, holding in trust the savings of the poor, are to be reorganized, from the ground up, and their funds intrusted to new hands, not by choice of stockholders but "by act of Congress."

It would be impossible to portray the full and ultimate effects of the program of legislation laid and to be laid before us to constitute the Democratic trust—or antitrust—program. To compare it to the effects, local and external, of the uprisings, revolutions, and counter-revolutions going on in Mexico during the past three years would be to unduly magnify the latter, and to draw comparisons between Villa and Carranza and Democratic leaders would be too intensely personal. But notwithstanding the respectable characters of those now in charge of the country's affairs, I warn them to pause before committing wrongs that can never be remedied, before they destroy the little of business prosperity which has survived their work thus far, and to forbear to break up the solid foundations upon which all prosperity may hereafter rest; to pause, to stay their ravages, to give time for investigation, and a kindlier reception than they have heretofore given to the voice of reason and justice. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the Progessives 1 hour and 40 minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I procured that time for the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER], a member of the Progressive Party, and I desire to be notified at the end of 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has just stated that the demand for antitrust legislation at this time comes from disgruntled agitators. He completely mistakes the temper and the will of the American people. The trusts and monopolies of this country are themselves responsible for the demand for remedial action, and their disregard of justice and every fundamental principle of this Republic has made the solution indispensable. Enterprises with great capital have deliberately sought not only industrial domination but political supremacy as well. They have entered the realm of government with insolent bearing and have attempted to name officials from the highest to the lowest.

Organized money, rioting ruthlessly in savage impulses, has forced this question upon us. We must decide whether wealth is to rule or manhood, whether this Nation is to be one of equal rights to all or special privileges to a few, whether honor and ability is to weigh in the selection of officials or cringing submission to corporate capital.

The conscience of the American people demands that action be taken, and any delay now will be a betrayal of their will. Great combinations of capital for many years have flaunted their power in the face of the citizenship, they have forced their corrupt way into politics and government, they have dictated the making of laws or scorned the laws they did not like, they have prevented the free and just administration of law. In doing this they have become a menace to free institutions, and must be dealt with in patriotic spirit, without fear or favor.

It is a common practice for standpatters to decry every forward step by denunciation of agitators. It would be well to pay some little attention to the fawning followers of crooked big business in the press, on the platform, and in public office. They sell themselves for price and place, and it would be well if they were dissected and their treason examined, while men are cataloguing the enemies of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I am in complete accord with the purpose and aim of this legislation, but I fear that its terms are such that if enacted into law it will only add more jests to the long list which has marked the antitrust legislation of America in the past. Trusts have been ordered dissolved in the past, and the only change effected was one in the methods of bookkeeping. It is time for straightforward action and an honest effort to protect the people from the powers that prey upon them.

GROWTH OF TRUST DOMINATION.

For 35 years combinations of capital have sought to form monopolies and profit from the community through the private taxing power which goes with the ability to control prices. In 1879 the Standard Alliance, composed of oil refiners, led the way, through a pooling system, and in a short time controlled 95 per cent of the refining business of the country. The Western Exporters' Association, made up of whisky distillers, followed, and it soon was in absolute control of the business. Others followed in the same path, and this pooling system flourished for a time.

But it did not give the complete control desired. It did not concern itself with the management of individual plants, but simply apportioned out the pro rata share of production. Each member of the pool could withdraw without notice, and thus the agreement had no stability. In their anxiety for quick and large profits the producers broke the market by their very greediness. The Whisky Trust and the Wire-Nail Trust Association went so far as to raise prices 200 per cent in the midst of falling prices. Jealousy caused trouble also, and the Lackawanna Iron & Steel Co. once broke the steel-rail pool because it was allowed only 17 per cent of the production.

Such defects in the control of prices stirred the producers to find other schemes to secure their aim, that of throttling the public and forcing the highest possible prices for products.

The next plan was the trust agreement, through which trustees were assigned the majority stock in constituent refineries. They controlled the boards of directors and collected all dividends on stock and distributed them to the holders of trust certificates. It was a better plan than the pool, for the pool was an outlaw in the courts, while in the trust agreement the trustees had the law on their side and could enforce their contracts.

The injustices which followed such control of prices, however, stirred lawmaking bodies to action. In 1890 many State legislatures passed antitrust laws, and in the same year the Sherman antitrust law was enacted for the purpose of dealing with combinations doing an interstate business.

So, another plan was necessary, and legal sharps were set to work to discover some juggling trick which would enable great combinations to wring millions from helpless consumers. While they sought for this ideal plan, the producers, having tasted the sweets of despotic control, carried on their nefarious plans through a system known as "community of interest." By the knowledge gained through close association, officials of different companies were able to act together and to prevent competition, even without any formal agreement.

This plan was still weak, for disagreements and misunderstandings meant a return to competition at any time, and that was what the different companies were striving to prevent.

Then came the discovery of the ideal scheme—the "holding corporation." It provided for a corporation to own the stock of competing companies, and it was proved in a short time to be a method in which to legally violate both law and justice. It excelled other plans, because it was not necessary to purchase the companies outright. Buying up a majority of the stock of the companies served every purpose. It escaped the troubles of the trust agreement, which was declared illegal because it was a conspiracy of several individuals, and this plan meant having one person, in the form of a corporation, control all the individual companies.

The Sugar Trust was the first to put this plan into operation, but others followed thick and fast. In 1897 there were 63 "holding companies" in existence, and in 1898–99 there were formed 183 such companies with a capitalization of $4,000,000,000, representing one-twentieth of the entire wealth of the country and twice the amount of money in circulation.

From that time trusts have flourished until to-day a trust controls almost every commodity of daily life. This has been done in spite of all efforts to prevent restraint of trade. Suits have been entered against these vast combinations, but in most instances they have failed, and the victory won in the others was but a shadow victory. The decisions of the Supreme Court have involved legal somersaults and twistings and turnings, but the old issue still remains. It is to-day a muddle of 24 years' stirring, and the time for clearing is certainly here.

In clearing that muddle straightforward measures are necessary. It is not necessary to specifically describe every unfair trade practice, but it is necessary that some tribunal have the power to deal with every unfair trade practice which leads to monopoly. This measure mentions a few—and only a few—of these practices; and, even if they could be thus rooted out, others are sure to take their place, to remedy which other legislation will be needed.

Such an interstate trade commission as that proposed in the Progressive bill before this body would prevent confusion, delay, and injustice. It would prevent the evils mentioned in this measure, price discriminations, "tying" contracts, and so forth, and would be empowered to deal with every evasion as it might arise. Time will prove that only through a tribunal with proper powers can these unfair practices be prevented.

EXEMPTION OF LABOR UNIONS.

Section 7 of this measure, with the change necessary to clearly prevent application of antitrust laws to fraternal, labor, and other voluntary organizations, is a great step in advance. The section reads:

> That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof.

This section, properly amended, will help to write the gospel of humanity into law. It is a recognition of the fundamental difference between human labor and the products of labor. Legislation dealing with trusts which control the products of labor can not be justly applied to the association of workers for their own betterment and improvement. One deals with materials, the other with men; one with mines, the other with miners; one with machines, the other with machinists; one with farms, the other with farmers; one with buildings, the other with builders; one with factories, the other with factory workers; one with tools, the other with toilers; one with property, the other with persons. You can not classify them together, for they are essentially different.

The free workers of America own themselves and their labor power. They may sell their labor power to others or they may withhold it. They may act together for the protection of their rights and interests, and it is a sham and a fraud to say that they may organize without the power to use means necessary to make organization a vital force in demanding and securing justice.

I stand for the right of labor to organize for its own advancement and to work for that purpose without being outlawed for it. This measure is right in purpose, and I hope it will be amended so that there shall be no shadow of doubt as to the right of the workers of this country to organize and exert themselves in legitimate activities without the danger of being prosecuted under antitrust laws. It is not a case of class legislation nor a demand for special privileges. It is simply a demand of humanity for freedom from restrictions and shackles that deny common justice.

The Sherman antitrust law has been made a potent force against organized labor, even while it proved unable to restrain marauding combinations of capital. In 1892 it was brought into action when some union men in New Orleans went on strike. Teamsters and workmen in many lines were concerned. Judge Billings, of the United States district court, declared that the strike was in restraint of interstate commerce and granted an injunction. The United States court of appeals agreed in his decision.

Two years later the point was again reached in the Pullman strike in Chicago. Injunctions against the strikers were granted by the courts under the Sherman Act and a number of the strikers were jailed for several months for disobeying the injunction.

Several years later another labor phase came into evidence. In Danbury, Conn., a small firm of hat manufacturers operated an open shop and was boycotted by labor unions. The court decided that the unions were acting as a combination in restraint of trade under the meaning of the Sherman antitrust law.

Many other instances might be cited to show that the antitrust laws have been used as a club over voluntary organizations, which were never intended to come within their scope. When the Sherman antitrust law was passed in the Senate it was clearly and unequivocally stated that its provisions would not cover such organizations. But history shows that the victories won under it have been the suits against labor organizations, while great trusts and monopolies have grown and flourished. It is to remedy such a flagrant injustice that this provision is included in this measure; and after it is amended to clearly accomplish its purpose of exemption, it should have the support of every Member of this House.

INJUNCTIONS AND JURY TRIAL.

The provisions in this measure for the regulation of injunctions and the procedure in contempt cases, while somewhat beyond the scope of antitrust legislation, are reforms long demanded by the American people. The expression "government by injunction" has become current because in almost every labor controversy in recent years the courts have been used by powerful corporations in the carrying out of their plans to subjugate employees and to prevent the exercise of lawful rights. The abuse of the right of injunction in the past 10 years has been sufficient to arouse the public, and this legislation is demanded by every right-thinking American citizen to-day.

Similar to that demand is the determination that the constitutional provision that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law and the judgment of his peers" shall be maintained. Freemen since the days of King John and Runnymede have demanded jury trial. It is a fundamental American doctrine. If jurors are competent to judge the law and the fact in criminal cases, why are they not competent in matters of injunction and contempt? The judge is not more competent to judge of a litigant's rights when his life is not at stake than when it is, and the individual or corporation that is afraid to submit his case to a jury for trial has no right to dictate laws for the administration of justice.

THE INVISIBLE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Chairman, the invisible government which has controlled the visible Government in this Nation for many years has been unscrupulous big business. We have been tracing some of its insidious, slimy ways in our lobby investigations of recent date. We have seen its arts of trickery and debauchery, its manipulations and its conspiracies. The time for forbearance is over and the time to strike has come. If this Nation is to be a government of the people by crooked big business, the doom of our free institutions is assured. I believe that firm and decisive action now will be for the best interest not only of the Nation at large but of business itself. Brazen defiance of the spirit of laws made to protect the public and cunning jugglery to evade them is in the final analysis the worst thing possible for business. Business protects itself against fires by vast expenditures for fire insurance, but there are other dangers worse than fires. One is the danger that the masses of the people will forget their patient endurance of injustice and long-suffering submission to wrong on the part of exploiting combinations and start a conflagration against which fire insurance will offer no protection.

Good business depends on the permanence of law and order. This Nation can not stand much more of fraud and plunder, savage impulses left unchecked, a controlled press, and misrepresentation of the truth and continue to have good business.

The real defenders of property to-day are not those who attempt to forestall every attempt at reform by denunciation and who put the blame for unrest not on those who pummel the people but on those who call attention to the black and blue spots. The real defenders of property are not the standpatters, who cry out against any change and shout, "let well enough alone," when the very worst thing that could happen would be to have things remain exactly as they are, no better and no worse.

No; the real defenders of property are the upholders of the rights of humanity, the Progressives, who believe that "new occasions teach new duties. Time makes ancient good uncouth. They must upward still and onward who would keep abreast of truth."

To-day, as always, there are men like Demetrius of Ephesus, who, when he saw that the preaching of Paul the apostle was harming his business of making silver idols, gathered his fellows together and raised a great hue and cry, shouting "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Their fervid devotion to Diana was as false as that of monopolists and their defenders to-day who shout "Great is property," when the public conscience demands that justice be done.

The greatest security to property comes from the security of human rights, and the sooner business realizes that fact the better it will be for all concerned.

THE PERIL OF COMPROMISE.

Mr. Chairman, the American people have a right to expect a better measure than this weak, halting, halfway attempt at remedy of intolerable conditions. It does not go to the root of the evils which have brought concentration of wealth and diffusion of poverty. I sincerely hope that it may be amended so that its expressed purposes may be accomplished, for there is a deadly peril in compromise with the forces that prey. There is no golden mean between right and wrong, between courage and cowardice, between honor and dishonor, between patriotism and treason, between the people's rights and monopoly. I believe in industrial and commercial peace, but not the peace that is purchased at the expense of justice and human liberty. There can be no peace in America except with the destruction of the sordid social wrongs and the putrid political methods which have attended the growth of the great combinations and monopolies of this country. This is an irrepressible conflict and there is no middle ground. The Nation looks to its Congress to strike a fair and square blow at hoary wrongs, and thus better the living conditions of the people of America. Lawmakers can concern themselves with nothing greater than that, and it is the duty as well as privilege of every representative of the people to make that his chief end and aim in his decision upon every measure before this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL], a member of the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the Members of the House have been very much impressed particularly with the difference of opinion that appears to exist on the other side of the House. The senior member upon the Judiciary Committee on the Republican side of the House [Mr. VOLSTEAD] substantially said that this bill did not do anything. After he concluded his remarks, the distinguished and able gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated that the bill was too drastic. Evidently it did something, and now we have just heard from the able representative of the Progressive Party, Mr. KELLY, that the bill does not do anything, and the only section of the bill that he has referred to in his eloquent address he proceeds to praise and to commend. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the condition made so manifest this evening on that side of the House is a condition that existed among our friends for the past 10 or 15 years, since these organizations have sought to come into existence and since they have been developed. One wing of the party wanted to regulate and to legislate. Another wing of the party, where these interests were so firmly intrenched, did not want to pass any legislation, so we have arrived at this situation, that there has been vouchsafed to the majority party of this House the responsibility of responding, I believe, to the wishes and to the hopes and the aspirations of 100,000,000 people and writing into the law this antitrust legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the senior Representative of the Republican Party upon our committee did credit or justice to himself when he stated that this bill was conceived and perfected in secret session.

I have been a member of other legislative bodies, Mr. Chairman, in the days gone by, and I have never served upon any committee that sought, as this committee has sought, the light and the aid of counsel and the assistance of business men from every section of the country. Why, Mr. Chairman, we counseled with the minority Members upon the committee in the perfection of this bill. Why, Mr. Chairman, we prepared three tentative drafts of this bill, and I believe that every member of the committee, Republicans as well as Progressives, offered suggestions in connection with this legislation. All of the meetings, as far as my knowledge goes, were open, and I do not believe that the gentleman intended to say that the majority members of this committee did not give opportunity to every member of the committee to participate in this splendid legislation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I interrupt the gentleman in order to ask him a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will you kindly tell us what steps you took to get before your committee representatives of the coal mining interests in the perfection of section No. 3?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the committee gave announcement through the press of the country that they wanted the aid and the counsel and the assistance of business men in every line of business and in every line of effort. And I recall distinctly that the chairman of the committee, in the presence of the newspaper men, stated that there had been some misunderstanding on the part of some men who did not believe they had an opportunity to come in; and he said, "I want you to make this as plain as you possibly can, that we invite counsel and cooperation of business men in every line of effort." So it was spread broadcast, and, as a matter of fact, if the gentleman will examine the hearings which the committee held, you will find that very many business men in every line of effort appeared before that committee and submitted their testimony.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Did, in fact, anybody who was familiar with the coal-mining business, with the production and sale of coal, appear before your committee and give information and advice with reference to the formulation of the ideas set forth in section No. 3?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think there was a brief filed. I do not recall any gentleman coming in and talking on that specific subject, but I think this committee had in mind the interests of these coal miners, and I am very sure that the members of the committee had in mind the interests of the coal consumers in this great country of ours.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Just to refresh the recollection of my colleague, I will say that Mr. Beck, of Chicago, representing the coal dealers and handlers, was there and testified and filed a brief.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am quite sure that is true, Mr. Chairman.

For the third time in his administration the President of the United States, on the 20th of January, 1914, addressed the Congress. On this important occasion he pointed out the need and the necessity of enacting into law legislation "regarding the very intricate matter of trusts and monopolies."

Mr. SWITZER. I would like to ask the gentleman why these men were the ones selected as "goats" in this bill, and nothing was said about the lumber dealers? Why did you select somebody who was not in any of your districts?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the members of this committee selected the mine owners or anybody else to be "goats." I do believe, Mr. Chairman, that this committee in writing this new principle—and it is a new principle of law in this country—are carrying out and carrying into the law what millions of citizens believe should have been the law years ago. We believe that God placed these minerals in the bowels of the earth, and when these men obtain title to the lands we do not believe that the minerals in the earth should go with the lands; and we believe that these minerals were placed there in order that they might serve humanity in various ways. [Applause.]

Mr. SWITZER. I would like to ask if God had not anything to do with the growing of timber?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think my Christian friend requires an answer from me upon that question. [Applause.]

The President said, among other things:

> What we are purposing to do, therefore, is, happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and government is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and honor of the land. The Government and business men are ready to meet each other halfway in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law. The best-informed men of the business world condemn the methods and processes and consequences of monopoly as we condemn them, and the instinctive judgment of the vast majority of business men everywhere goes with them. We shall now be their spokesmen. That is the strength of our position and the sure prophecy of what will ensue when our reasonable work is done.

In pursuance of that notable message and in accord with its high purpose and courageous spirit the members of the Judiciary Committee have presented to the House for its consideration and determination this program of antitrust legislation. We confidently believe that its enactment into law will bring a new tone, a new spirit, a new independence, an initiative and a freedom to business that it has never known before. We believe that it will open the door of opportunity to those who have endeavored to enter the field of business free and untrammeled and that its manifold blessings will be more and more evident to all of our citizens as soon as business readjustments have taken place under its operation.

The committee has ever kept in mind and has endeavored to write into the law those things that will not hurt or hinder honestly conducted business, and it has kept before it the standard of justice, of equality, of opportunity, to all the people of the country.

This bill in its entirety is responsive to the best and most enlightened standards existing among men. The Sherman law, so called, passed in 1890, and was enacted to meet a condition that was becoming intolerable, indefensible, and oppressive. This bill supplements that act without changing its essential features. The speedy enactment of this bill into law will mark a new era in the business development of this Nation. Preceded in this administration by the tariff and currency legislation, it is the culminating feature of the program promised by our party platform, indorsed by the people of the Nation, urged by the President of the United States, and now to be enacted into law by the Congress of the United States. When the historian comes to write the story of the Wilson administration and this period of our national development, I think it will be referred to as the great constructive period of our history. We are, I believe, happily emerging from an era in which the standard of business morality has not been a credit to the country; from an era of criticism which laid bare the unfair and oppressive practices of business, but had in it only the germ of construction which is now finding its full fruition in this pending legislation.

No more earnest effort has ever been made by any body of men in any assemblage anywhere to readjust business enterprises, to develop and equalize opportunity, than by those who have been following the guidance of President Wilson in the tariff, currency, and antitrust legislation. [Applause.]

The all-important thing is to proceed sanely, fairly, and justly, in order that our people in this great land may share in the bounteous blessings that the Almighty has poured out with lavish hand in unstinted measure. The day of the man or the corporation or group of individuals who are a law unto themselves, who trample upon the laws of municipality, State, and Nation, who sweep aside every principle of equity and justice and fair dealing in their striving for unholy wealth, influence, and power by the enjoyment of some special privilege is, I believe, passing.

Their greatness and their power has neither awed nor influenced your committee, but, rather, has impressed it with the splendid opportunity which was afforded to legislate for that great unnumbered body of our citizens who are looking with their faces uplifted to this Congress to do justice to them and to give to them and their children the free and untrammeled right of doing business without bending the suppliant knee to any petty tyrant who heads some great industrial enterprise that wants the entire field for himself and all the citizens for his victims. [Applause.]

The policy of this legislation, the aim, the hopes, and the aspirations of the members of your committee are to build up, to construct, to develop, and to enlarge opportunity and to place business upon a footing so sound, so stable, so enduring, that countless millions of people will for years to come look back from the midst of their prosperity and their happiness to this great constructive piece of legislation in the trinity of measures passed by this administration.

Let us see what this antitrust measure seeks to accomplish.

DEFINITION OF COMMERCE.

The bill, in the first place, seeks to broaden the meaning of the word "commerce," as used in the Sherman Act of July 2, 1890, so as to make it include trade and commerce between any insular possessions or other places under the jurisdiction of the United States.

PREVENTION OF UNFAIR DISCRIMINATION.

One of the chief provisions of the bill, and one which should command the support and win the commendation of every Member of the House, is the provision of the bill seeking to prevent unfair discrimination. One of the greatest evils in business at the present time is this unfair trade practice. Certain great corporations, and even some of the lesser ones, have stifled and choked out competition by selling their products at a lower price than their competitors in certain communities than in all other places where they have no competition. Invariably, when in any particular community they have vanquished their little competitor and put him out of business, they raise the price and rule the market with undisputed sway. This bill forbids such discrimination when it is made with purpose or intent to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor, either of such dealer or seller. The bill seeks only to prevent the unfair practice. It does not prevent discrimination in prices of commodities on account of differences in grade, quality, and quantity of the commodity sold, or on account of due allowance for the difference in the cost of transportation.

The chief offenders in this direction have been the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. Any fair-minded man can readily see that where in the community a corporation seeks to kill off competition by lowering the price of the commodity even below the cost of production or manufacture in many instances, this loss must be made up by charging more than the fair market price in other communities where there is no competition, but a free field to charge all that the consumer can possibly stand.

This evil practice has been one most widespread and one that has wrought great havoc with competitors and with the public. Different States of the Union, some 19 in number, have tried to cope with this evil, but their efforts have been weak and ineffectual. This is so because the method that proved disastrous and sent the prices soaring in the other sections of the same State to recoup the loss in a specific locality was carried out on the same plan, but on a larger scale. These gigantic organizations doing business in the 48 States of the Union were able, in States that prevented discrimination in different localities in the same State, to put their prices so uniformly low that they swept all competition from the State. Then, in order to recoup their losses in the State, they used the other States in the Union to make up their profits where they had no competition.

In the State which I have the honor to represent in part this evil practice was recognized and our legislature in 1912 passed an act, chapter 651, which I shall incorporate in my speech with some Massachusetts court decisions and illustrative cases on the evils of contracts which seek to restrain trade. I had urged and voted years ago for legislation of this character while a member of the Massachusetts House and Senate, and it is a great privilege to now be a member of an American Congress that will put through this splendid provision of law abolishing unfair discriminations. [Applause.]

Who can refuse to support a proposition of this character that has bound up in it the absolute breaking up of a great evil in business, the continuance of which will cost the American people millions of dollars and the ending of which will bring to business free and unrestrained competition and to the public an open market and reduced prices? This feature of the bill is one of the most praiseworthy and commendable in it. [Applause.]

DECISIONS AND ILLUSTRATIVE CASES ON THE EVILS OF CONTRACT IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

[Massachusetts Law, chap. 651, acts 1912.]

Any person, firm, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the Commonwealth and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall maliciously, or for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor and of creating a monopoly in any locality, discriminate between different sections, communities, towns, or cities of this Commonwealth or between purchasers by selling such commodity at a lower rate for such purpose in one section, community, town, or city than is charged for such commodity by the vendor in another section, community, town, or city in the Commonwealth, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the grade or quality and in the cost of transportation, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful. (L. 1912, c. 651, sec. 1.)

It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, association, or corporation to combine with any other person, firm, association, or corporation for the purpose of destroying the trade or business of any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in selling goods or commodities and of creating a monopoly within this Commonwealth, and any such combination is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful. (Id., sec. 2.)

Any person, firm, association, or corporation found guilty of violating any provision of this act, if an individual, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 or more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one month or more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and if the offender is a corporation, then by a fine as aforesaid. (Id., sec. 3.)

Whoever, in his individual capacity, or acting in behalf of any firm, association, or corporation, for the purpose of evading any provision of this act, shall appoint agents, secure or hold the control of corporate stock, or by agreement with any other person, firm, association, or corporation cause any of the commodities mentioned in section 1 to be sold for the purpose of such evasion or attempt to evade, shall be punished by imprisonment in the State prison for not less than six months or not more than five years, if an individual; and if any of the acts specified in this section are done by a corporation, then the directors, stockholders, or agents authorizing such evasion or discrimination shall each be held guilty thereof and shall be punished in the manner provided in this section for individuals. (Id., sec. 4.)

All contracts or agreements made in violation of any provision of this act shall be void. (Id., sec. 5.)

It shall be the duty of the district attorneys, in their districts, and of the attorney general to enforce the provisions of this act by appropriate actions in courts of competent jurisdiction, but nothing herein shall limit the right of any court to issue warrants and make commitments to await the action of the grand jury under this act in the case of crimes under the common law, and such power is hereby given to the courts of the Commonwealth. (Id., sec. 6.)

If complaint shall be made to the secretary of the Commonwealth that any person, firm, association, or corporation authorized to do business in this Commonwealth is guilty of any violation of this act, it shall be the duty of the secretary of the Commonwealth to refer the matter to the attorney general, who shall, if the facts justify it in his judgment, institute proceedings in the courts against such persons, firm, association, or corporation. (Id. sec. 7.)

If any corporation, foreign or domestic, authorized to do business in this Commonwealth is found guilty of any violation of this act, such finding shall cause a forfeiture of all the privileges and rights conferred upon the corporation by general or special law of this Commonwealth and shall bar its right to do business in this Commonwealth. (Id., sec. 8.)

If any corporation, after having been found guilty of any violation of this act, shall continue or attempt to do business in this Commonwealth, it shall be the duty of the attorney general, by a proper action in the name of the Commonwealth, to oust such corporation from all business of every kind and character in this Commonwealth. (Id., sec. 9.)

Nothing in this act shall be construed as repealing any other act, or part of an act, except such acts or parts of acts, if any there be, as are inconsistent herewith. (Id., sec. 10.)

[Chap. 709.]

An act to enlarge the powers and duties of the attorney general.

SECTION 1. It shall be the duty of the attorney general, and he is hereby authorized, to take cognizance of all violations of law or of orders of courts, tribunals, or commissions affecting the general welfare of the people, including combinations, agreements, and unlawful practices in restraint of trade or for the suppression of competition, or for the undue enhancement of the price of articles or commodities in common use, and to institute or cause to be instituted such criminal or civil proceedings before the appropriate State and Federal courts, tribunals, and commissions as the attorney general may deem to be for the interest of the public, and to investigate all matters in which he has reason to believe that there has been such violation. To carry out the purposes of this act he may appoint such assistant or assistants as he may deem necessary to act for him under his direction, and, with the approval of the governor and council, he shall fix their compensation. In all criminal proceedings instituted under this act the attorney general may require district attorneys to assist him and to act for him in their respective districts, and in all matters so referred to them the district attorneys shall be under the jurisdiction and direction of the attorney general.

SEC. 2. To carry out the provisions of this act the attorney general, with the consent of the governor and council, may expend a sum not exceeding $5,000 from the treasury of the Commonwealth.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect upon its passage.

ILLUSTRATIVE CASES.

THE EVILS OF CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE (MASSACHUSETTS, 1837).

The unreasonableness of contracts in restraint of trade and business is very apparent from several obvious considerations:

(1) Such contracts injure the parties making them, because they diminish their means of procuring livelihoods and a competency for their families. They tempt improvident persons, for the sake of present gain, to deprive themselves of the power to make future acquisitions, and they expose such persons to imposition and oppression.

(2) They tend to deprive the public of the services of men in the employments and capacities in which they may be most useful to the community as well as themselves.

(3) They discourage industry and enterprise and diminish the products of ingenuity and skill.

(4) They prevent competition and enhance prices.

(5) They expose the public to all the evils of monopoly; and this especially is applicable to wealthy companies and large corporations who have the means, unless restrained by law, to exclude rivalry, monopolize business, and engross the market. Against evils like these wise laws protect individuals and the public by declaring all such contracts void. (Alger v. Thacker, 19 Pick., Mass., 51.)

AN AGREEMENT NOT TO MANUFACTURE FIRE ALARMS (MASSACHUSETTS, 1893).

An inventor and manufacturer of fire-alarm apparatus sold his machinery, stock, business, and patents to another person and agreed not to engage in such business and not to enter into competition with the purchaser, either directly or indirectly, for a period of 10 years. The court held the agreement good as regards the letters patent and the improvements which the inventor agreed to convey; but it was void in so far as it purported to bind the inventor not to manufacture or sell fire alarms under other patents or under no patents. (Gamewell Fire Alarm Tel. Co. v. Crane, 160 Mass., 50.)

AGREEMENT OF BED-QUILT MANUFACTURER NOT TO SELL UNLIMITED AS TO SPACE (MASSACHUSETTS, 1888).

A manufacturer of bed quilts and comfortables conveyed to defendant his entire business and agreed not to engage in such business for five years. The court held that this was clearly illegal and void as being in restraint of trade, because not limited as to space. (Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass., 469.)

CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE AT COMMON LAW—AGREEMENT NOT TO RUN A STAGE ON A CERTAIN ROAD UNDER PENALTY (MASSACHUSETTS, 1811).

A man ran a stage on the road between Boston and Providence. A rival contemplated setting up a stage on the same road. The man who was running the stage sold his stagecoach and horse to his rival and entered into a bond not to run the stage on such road under a certain penalty. The court held the bond void, and said:

"If it does not appear whether the contract was or was not made on good consideration, so that the contract may be either good or bad, it is the prima facie presumption of law that the contract is bad, because it is to the prejudice of trade and honest industry, because the mischief to one party is apparent, and the benefit only presumptive, and because the apparent mischief is not merely private but also public. Therefore all contracts barely in restraint of trade where no consideration is shown are bad. (Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass., 222.)

THE RIGHT OF THE INDIVIDUAL TO THE DECREE OF THE GOVERNMENT SUIT.

A remarkable situation prevailed when the Government won its suits against the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust. In these cases the Supreme Court of the United States found unanimously, without a dissenting voice, that acts had been committed which were not only illegal but immoral. These combinations had been effected, in large part, by the crushing out of rivals. At the end of these very long court proceedings a decree was finally entered, declaring that there should be a segregation. The lamentable fact, then, became patent that those who had been crushed and driven out of business, "the heroes," as one witness put it, "who had made it possible for the Government successfully to conduct its proceedings to a final decree," were left without a remedy, and no way could be found that would give them redress for the wrongs which they had suffered.

The situation was, indeed, intolerable and a travesty upon justice. Small wonder that men cried out in their hopelessness that there was no justice in the land for the poor. It was found that none of those who were injured could, under existing law, recover for the injuries that had been sustained by the illegal acts of these combinations. They could, of course, institute entirely new proceedings, but they could not in any way benefit from the decree which had been entered. The further fact was presented that as these proceedings had covered a long period of time, even if the parties were alive and could proceed against the offending corporations, such proceedings would be barred by the statute of limitations.

These great proceedings signally failed, as far as those who had previously been injured were concerned. There was no way that most of them could recover damages for the injuries sustained. President Wilson in his message specifically referred to this situation when he said:

> I hope that we shall agree in giving private individuals who claim to have been injured by these processes the right to found their suits for redress upon the facts and judgments proved and entered in suits by the Government where the Government has upon its own initiative sued the combinations complained of and won its suit, and that the statute of limitations shall be suffered to run against such litigants only from the date of the conclusion of the Government's action. It is not fair that the private litigant should be obliged to set up and establish again the facts which the Government has proved. He can not afford, he has not the power, to make use of such processes of inquiry as the Government has command of. Thus shall individual justice be done while the processes of business are rectified and squared with the general conscience.

This bill provides that a final decree obtained by the United States in a suit to dissolve a corporation or unlawful combination may be offered in evidence in a suit brought by any individual for damages sustained under antitrust laws, and that such decree of judgment shall be conclusive evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law as between the parties in the original suit or proceeding. It also further provides to meet the situation, and the President's suggestion, that the statute of limitations shall be suspended in favor of private litigants who have sustained damage during the pendency of the suit or proceeding instituted in behalf of the United States. It is a provision of the bill that is designed to help the man of small means who has been wrongfully injured, and places in his hands the result brought about by the legal machinery of the Government.

EXCLUSIVE AND TYING CONTRACTS.

During the past 10 or 15 years there has grown up in business an ingenious system of exclusive or "tying" contracts, which in operation is so completely monopolistic as to leave but a very narrow and restricted field for operation, constantly becoming smaller and smaller and only occupied with the greatest courage and perseverance. A gentleman testified before our committee that one company manufacturing shoe machinery now supplies about 99 per cent or perhaps 99½ per cent of the machines that make welt shoes in this country. He was asked to put it the other way, and he said that 99 to 99½ per cent of the welt shoes made in the country were made upon machinery of this company, and of all the other shoes perhaps in as great a proportion, but of all machine-made shoes at least 95 to 98 per cent. Another company has destroyed practically all competition and acquired a virtual monopoly of all kodak films manufactured and sold in the United States. It was shown before the committee that an automobile manufacturing company capitalized for $2,000,000 made a profit of $25,000,000, net, on their investment in a single year. This profit was the profit of that $2,000,000 supplemented by many times that many millions actually invested by local dealers in the machinery of that company by so-called selling agencies throughout the country. The system under which these monopolies have been able to dominate absolutely the field has been brought about by these so-called exclusive agencies and "tying" contracts.

A competitor who desires to place his goods upon the market against any of these companies is prevented from so doing because the leases or contracts of the other companies restrict him from so doing. It has been contended that the justification for leases which are so made is that the leases are upon patented articles. Thus they are granted the privilege of combining various companies. With these restricted contracts in which one machine is tied to another all other machines are excluded because their machines are subjects of patents.

This monopoly has been built up by these "tying" contracts so that in order to get one machine one must take all of the essential machines, or practically all. Independent companies who have sought to enter the field have found that the markets have been preempted.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is there danger in the fact that one company supplies all the machinery, or is it in the manner in which it reached that place, or is it in both?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is in the manner.

Mr. FESS. You would not object to the one company doing it if it could be done legitimately?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not if it could be done legitimately. They would be able to meet these great companies in competition, but there is no field for them. The manufacturers do not want to break their contracts with these giant monopolies, because, if they should attempt to install machinery, their business might be jeopardized and all the machinery now leased by these giant monopolies would be removed from their places of business. No situation cries more urgently for relief than does this situation, and this bill seeks to prevent exclusive "tying" contracts that have brought about a monopoly, alike injurious to the small dealers, to the manufacturers, and grossly unfair to those who seek to enter the field of competition and to the millions of consumers.

This system of monopolistic contract was recognized in the State of Massachusetts as far back as 1907, and a statute was passed, and the first of its kind, I believe, in the country, which sought to meet this evil. It was a brave effort on the part of the State, but it did not prove successful, as evil practices continue to an even greater degree. It was recognized as an evil as far as back as 1901, when a great shoe and leather journal said:

> The fact is the great strides made by American inventors and manufacturers of shoe machinery were made under competitive conditions. It has been so, and will be so again. As sure as day succeeds the night, the establishment of a virile opposition to the present machinery monopoly will bring to life new ideas and appliances in this field, as the showers and sunshine bring forth the flowers of the field.

It must be apparent that the sole object of these exclusive agencies, so called, is for the manufacturer to drive out competition and to establish a monopoly in the particular locality or community. This contract completely shuts out competition in the business of the local dealer with whom he makes it. The dealer, bound by the contract, becomes as anxious as the manufacturer to drive out competition in his locality. Vast sums of money are spent for advertising, and every means that it is possible to use is brought to the assistance of the local dealer to give him a complete monopoly of the commodity which he agrees to handle exclusively.

Who can question the damage and the detriment that such a system brings to the consumer and to the public generally?

This bill will stop that artificially created system of business and will open the competitive field where all may buy from whom and where they will, and the public shall have the benefit of this wholesome competition.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATES.

In recent years there has been a tremendous concentration of wealth in the hands of a few individuals and corporations, and this has developed and increased to such an extent as to challenge the imagination. It has been recognized by our party and by this Congress that one of the most effective ways to check this great evil, that such concentration may be further prevented, is to stop the interlocking of directorates of such corporations as banks and railroads, industrial, commercial, and public-service corporations.

It is inconceivable that any one man or any small, limited number of men are all who are qualified to serve upon boards of directors. This bill will prevent the interlocking of directorates. In the first instance, it provides that no person who is engaged as an individual or member of a partnership or as director or other officer of the corporation engaged in the business of producing or selling equipment, material, or supplies, or in the construction or maintenance of railroads or other common carriers shall be eligible to serve on the board of an interstate railroad corporation.

It is further provided in this paragraph that no person who is engaged as an individual or who is a member of a partnership, or is a director or other officer of a corporation which is engaged in the conduct of a bank or trust company shall act as a director or other officer or employee of any common carrier for which he or such partnership or bank or trust company acts, either separately or in connection with others, as agents for or underwriter of the sale or disposal by such common carrier of issues or parts of issues of its securities, or from which he or such partnership or bank or trust company purchases, either separately or in connection with others, issues or parts of issues of securities of such common carriers.

The next paragraph of the bill deals with the eligibility of directors, officers and employees of banks, banking associations, and trust companies organized or operating under the laws of the United States, either of which has deposits, capital, surplus, or undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000, and provides that no private banker or person who is a director in any bank or trust company organized and operating under the laws of a State having such aggregate amount of deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits shall be eligible to be a director in any bank or banking association organized or operating under the laws of the United States.

The last paragraph of the section deals with the eligibility of directors in industrial corporations engaged in commerce, and provides that no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, other than common carriers which are subject to the act to regulate commerce, if such corporations are or shall have been theretofore by virtue of their business and location of operation competitors, so that an elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the provisions of the antitrust laws. Mutual savings banks not having capital stock represented by shares are exempt from the provisions of this bill.

By means of the interlocking of directorates one man or group of men have been able to dominate and control a great number of corporations, to the advantage of those corporations and to the detriment of the small ones dependent upon them and to the injury of the public.

The evils of this system are so well known as to be commonly understood. This bill will wipe out these abuses, and, as has been well said, new men, new blood, new energy, and new enterprise will bring about an impetus to business that will redound to the benefit of the country. [Applause.]

DISTRIBUTION OF COAL AND OTHER MINE PRODUCTS.

There are various other provisions of great importance in this bill. I have not time on this floor at this time to dwell at length upon them. One provision of this bill makes it unlawful for the owner or operator of a mine or the controlling factor in the disposition of the product of the mine to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person who applies to purchase the same. God has placed the minerals, the coal, the iron, the copper in the bowels of the earth. They were placed there for the benefit of all mankind and not for the benefit and enrichment of those who have acquired title to the lands. This principle, new in the country, will free the dealer, manufacturer, and consumer from the monopolistic grip of the mine owner and give the great mass of our people the benefit and the use upon equal terms of those things that were always believed to be until recent years for the good of all. Coal, particularly, which is so necessary, must be sold to all purchasers alike and not to a monopoly, which has been charging what it saw fit. No preference or discrimination will be allowed, and coal and other necessary mine products so useful to all our people will be at the disposal of all alike. I believe this provision of the bill will prove of inestimable and lasting benefit to the great consuming public.

RIGHTS OF LABOR.

Our party, in the passage of legislation, has given to the great laboring masses of the country and to organized labor already a fuller measure of service than has any Congress in a generation. Since the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law, it is contended by the laboring people of the country that their organizations were in constant jeopardy and danger of destruction. Labor should not stand upon such uncertain ground. The brawn and the brain and the sinews of the great body of the people of this country have always been its greatest asset in times of peace as well as in times of war. Labor brought forth the riches from the mines, has hewed the forests, has made the land to bloom and to blossom and bring forth its fruits; labor has manned the vessels, carried the products made by myriads of hands in factory, field, and forest to the marts of the world, and our party has ever recognized the country's greatest asset, the honest toiler and laborer. [Applause.] The right to organize and the legal recognition of such organizations should not be a debatable question.

In the last Congress a bill was passed through the House regulating the use of injunctions and also the procedure in contempt cases. These bills were incorporated in the bill now before the House for consideration, and I confidently believe that this Congress will write them into the law of the land.

CONCLUSION.

I believe that the country is quite familiar with the purpose and scope of the legislative program now about to be enacted. I have the disposition, but not the time, to discuss at length or to elaborate all of the beneficial features of this bill. I have taken occasion to refer to some of its most important provisions. Other provisions almost fully as important are embraced within it. Countless people are awaiting its passage and expect that under its operation a new era of industrial freedom will begin. That is the hope, the purpose, and the desire of those who stand sponsor for this legislation. Our party's record of achievement in the very brief time that it has been intrusted with power justifies the hope and confident expectation that the average man who only desires a free field and an equal opportunity will approve it as the greatest measure of industrial freedom that has been written on the statute books of our land; that the business man who desires an independence and a free field for his operations will find protection and ample opportunity here provided, and that the great public, the victims, helpless and unwilling as they have been, at the mercy of these extortionate organizations, will welcome and receive the bounteous blessings that I believe will flow freely through the land upon its passage. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FERRIS, as Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and other bills under the special order of the House, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until to-morrow, Saturday, May 23, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 23, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we look to Thee as the source and measure of the power that enters into so vast a civilization as we represent. We know that this power has not been found in the blind and heartless forces of nature, and can never be a mere expression of evolution in the line of the forces of a world like this. Sometime, somewhere, Thou hast breathed into them the forms of law and given to them life, and made them express the will and the power of the absolute and infinite God. We look to Thee for Thy guidance, that all our work begun, continued, and ended in Thee may accomplish Thy mighty purpose and bring to the earth the great design of our loving Father. We ask these things for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. JAMES and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

AMERICAN CORN IN ENGLISH MARKETS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have two letters here which are in substance a petition, and I will ask leave to read them. They will go into the RECORD in that way. They are very short, and I especially would like the attention to the letter of those Senators who believed that there was no demand whatever for any character of grain inspection in the United States. Since the failure of that bill there has been organized a boycott throughout all continental Europe against all American maize, unless the United States Government will proceed to give them a Government inspection. I will read a letter from the secretary of the London Corn Exchange to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States. I wish that I could have the attention of Senators to it. The letter is as follows:

LONDON CORN TRADE ASSOCIATION,
EXCHANGE CHAMBERS, 28 ST. MARY AXE,
London, E. C., May 15, 1914.

The SECRETARY UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

SIR: I am directed by my executive committee to inclose you copies of our revised American contract forms for corn, which have been drafted after consultation with United Kingdom and continental corn-trade associations, embodying their unanimous opinion that in the future the basis of your corn business to Europe should be Government official inspection certificates in respect to quality and moisture content.

My committee respectfully ask your department to use its influence to get a bill passed by your Congress with as little delay as possible to provide for Government official inspection certificates in respect to quality and moisture content, as such certificates will be the only terms upon which European buyers will in the future be prepared to buy corn.

I remain, sir, yours, faithfully,

H. B. GRIPPER, Secretary.

The London Corn Trade Association have sent a form to the Secretary of Agriculture, showing the contract for the purchase of all corn in the future from the United States. The corn referred to is our corn or their maize. One provision in this contract is—

United States Department of Agriculture certificate of inspection at port of shipment to be final as to quality and moisture content.

The same secretary, Mr. Gripper, also sent me a letter which I will read. It is as follows:

LONDON CORN TRADE ASSOCIATION,
EXCHANGE CHAMBERS, 28 ST. MARY AXE,
London, E. C., May 15, 1914.

Senator P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

SIR: I have been instructed to inclose you a copy of our letter to the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, in respect to our revised contract forms for corn (copies of these forms also inclosed), and my committee trust that you will see your way to use your influence in getting a bill passed by your Congress providing for only Government official inspectors, which European buyers of your corn consider to be absolutely necessary.

I remain, sir, yours, faithfully,

H. B. GRIPPER, Secretary.

Mr. President, it was stated in the debate here some time ago that our certificates carried verity as to quality greater than the certificate from any other country in the world in regard to our corn and wheat. I denied the proposition at that time and claimed that it was not true, and I expostulated to these empty seats against drawing any such conclusion, and read to them the objections that were made by the foreign purchasers of corn. Now, these foreign purchasers have for years been developing the Argentine corn trade to escape the impositions of the exchange or board of trade inspections. Having developed the corn industry in Argentina to such an extent as to be independent of the American supply, European buyers have entered into a contract that they will no longer purchase American corn unless that corn is inspected by the Government and the certificate of inspection showing its quality and moisture is issued.

This is the agreement. I am not going to put it in the RECORD. I have read enough to indicate what its purpose is and to demonstrate what I have been trying to impress upon the Senate, that we have lost market after market in Europe; that we have invited the development of the Argentine wheat fields and the Argentine corn fields and the Argentine stock industry to compete against the American industries in those lines, simply because we have refused, again and again, in response to their earnest application that we would relieve them from the frauds which have been perpetrated upon them by our exchanges in their methods of certifying.

We have destroyed our very best markets in many places in Europe because the buyers could not depend upon American certifications. Finally, after they have turned their attention to Russia and to Argentina, after they have thrown their capital by millions into the Argentine country, to produce wheat and corn fields that they may not any longer be subject to the injustices that are perpetrated upon both the producer and the consumer, they have reached that stage in which they can now say to the American Republic, "We will no longer accept your corn and other grain unless it is certified by your Department of Agriculture, because we have learned that we can put no reliance whatever upon your certificates issued by your boards of trade."

This may not mean anything to those Senators who represent great cities, but when we are beginning to destroy our markets abroad and when we are, on the other hand, opening up our gates to the north for all of the cereals that may be produced by foreign countries, it is worthy, Mr. President, of a little consideration, and I believe the time will yet come when the Senate of the United States will consider that corn and wheat and oats and barley all combined ought to have a standing somewhat equal to that of cotton and be treated with just consideration by the American Congress.

MEXICO.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Mexico: The record of a conversation with President Wilson," by Samuel G. Blythe, published in the Saturday Evening Post of May 23, 1914.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he would have any objection to having the record of that conversation read? We hardly have time in the hurry of business to go back and search the RECORD for such things. If it is important enough to be put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and is short, as I understand, would the Senator object to its being read?

Mr. JAMES. I have no objection at all to the article being read. I merely wanted to save the time of the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I object to the article being read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the question is, Shall the article be read? [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it, and the article will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The article referred to is as follows:

MEXICO: THE RECORD OF A CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT WILSON.

(By Samuel G. Blythe.)

"My ideal is an orderly and righteous government in Mexico; but my passion is for the submerged 85 per cent of the people of that Republic, who are now struggling toward liberty."

The President closed his fingers into a sinewy fist. He leaned forward in his chair—leaned forward as a man leans forward who is about to start on a race, his body taut, his muscles tense. I could see the cords stand out on the back of his neck. His eyes were narrowed, his lips slightly parted, his vigor and earnestness impressive.

Bang! He hit the desk with that clenched fist. The paper knife rattled against the tray and a few open letters stirred a bit from the jar of the blow.

"I challenge you," he said, "to cite me an instance in all the history of the world where liberty was handed down from above. Liberty always is attained by the forces working below, underneath, by the great movement of the people. That, leavened by the sense of wrong and oppression and injustice, by the ferment of human rights to be attained, brings freedom." The President relaxed from his tense attitude and smiled.

"It is a curious thing," he continued, "that every demand for the establishment of order in Mexico takes into consideration, not order for the benefit of the people of Mexico, the great mass of the population, but order for the benefit of the old-time régime, for the aristocrats, for the vested interests, for the men who are responsible for this very condition of disorder. No one asks for order because order will help the masses of the people to get a portion of their rights and their land; but all demand it so that the great owners of property, the overlords, the hidalgos, the men who have exploited that rich country for their own selfish purposes, shall be able to continue their processes undisturbed by the protests of the people from whom their wealth and power have been obtained.

"The dangers that beset the Republic are held to be the individual and corporate troubles of these men, not the aggregated injustices that have been heaped on this vastly greater section of the population that is now struggling to recover by force what has always been theirs by right.

"They want order—the old order; but I say to you that the old order is dead. It is my part, as I see it, to aid in composing those differences so far as I may be able, that the new order, which will have its foundation on human liberty and human rights, shall prevail."

We were sitting in the old Cabinet room, on the second floor of the White House, now changed to a library and workroom for the President. Two sides of the walls are lined with books, and opposite the mantel there hangs a great picture of the signing of the Spanish War peace treaty, showing President McKinley gazing benignantly at Secretary Day and the Spanish commissioner, who, seated side by side, are writing their names on the document that formally ended the war of 1898. A great globe stands in the corner—a great blue globe, with many lines traced on it, many lines running from Washington to the south. There was a cluster of red roses in the corner, and a little breeze fluttered the curtains of the windows that looked out on the fountain, the wonderful masses of bloom on the flowering trees, the new, soft green of the leaves, and the velvet of the grass. A searchlight played on the tip of the Washington Monument, and, far back, the Dome of the Capitol swam mistily in the silver light of the new moon.

The President was in evening dress, and he seemed strong and vigorous as he sat facing me at the side of his desk. He was waiting to go to a conference between the Attorney General, the Secretary of War, and Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, over the mining strike in the Senator's State.

We talked for three-quarters of an hour. The President went freely and frankly into the situation—told his ideals, his hopes, his plans, his conclusions—dealing, of course, with the subject in a general rather than in a specific way, because of the length of time I told him must ensue between the talk and the publication of what I might write concerning it, and the knowledge that in a day-to-day event like this, with its constantly shifting series of happenings, summaries must be resorted to rather than immediate comment.

As a result of my conversation with the President, which was on the evening of April 27, only a few hours after word had come that Huerta would accept the offer of mediation made by the representatives of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile, I can state these conclusions, which will endure regardless of the outcome of mediation negotiations. The settled policy of the President in regard to Mexico will be as follows:

First. The United States, so long as Mr. Wilson is President, will not seek to gain a foot of Mexican territory in any way or under any pretext. When we have finished with Mexico, Mexico will be territorially intact.

Second. No personal aggrandizement by American investors or adventurers or capitalists, or exploitation of that country, will be permitted. Legitimate business interests that seek to develop rather than exploit will be encouraged.

Third. A settlement of the agrarian land question by constitutional means—such as that followed in New Zealand, for example—will be insisted on.

These are the materialistic ideals of President Wilson, the main points he has firmly in his mind. His future policy will rest on these foundations, regardless of what the moment may inject into the situation in the way of minor questions.

We talked for a few moments on that April evening of the historic associations of the portion of the White House where we were, which, until the time of President Roosevelt, was used by the Presidents as office and workroom by the clerical force, by the Cabinet, and as the public reception room. It was in this part of the White House that all the preliminaries of the Spanish War were decided on by President McKinley, and it was this portion of the White House that President Lincoln occupied as his office and workroom during the Civil War. Now it makes up a part of the home space in the White House; but in that library where we were sitting, and where McKinley's Cabinet debated the Spanish War and Lincoln's Cabinet debated the Civil War, a great many of the problems of Mexico, whether war problems or peace problems, have been and will be considered by President Wilson.

"Mr. President," I began, "I have recently been through the country somewhat, and I am constantly meeting men who have arrived from various States. I find and they find that, though the people of this country are patriotic and are loyally standing by the administration, they do not, as a whole, know just what they are patriotic about."

"I have found that to be true, in a measure, myself," said the President, "and I am glad of an opportunity to explain my ideas and my ideals on the subject."

He stopped for a moment, as though to select a place for beginning. I noticed that his face, instead of being pale, as it was the last time I saw him, was burned by the sun; that his eye was clear and bright, and his whole attitude that of a man who is strong and well. I noticed, too, that his hands were not burned by the sun; and as he talked I watched those hands and observed how he used them constantly—not in widespread gestures, but rather in supplementary and interpretative motions, as though he were a musician speaking the score of his music and playing the notes with his fingers as he went along. I doubt whether his hands, except when he thwacked the desk, moved more than 12 inches one way or the other; but they seemed almost a part of his speech and expressed his various attitudes of mind and emotion when he proceeded as vividly as did the intonation of his voice and the emphasis of his words.

He sat back in his chair and half closed his eyes. His fingers laced and interlaced. Then he began to talk, clearly, simply, with a clarity of diction, a sequence of thought, and a lucidity of expression that seemed even more remarkable than it really was when compared with the muddied speech of many of our statesmen. Now and then he used a colloquialism. Once or twice he dropped into slang. He spoke of some one "butting in," and he said, "We must hump ourselves." He marshaled his facts with such precision and presented his ideas so cogently that it was apparent his viewpoint was the result of a long and continuous study of every phase of the minor problems involved in the great problem, Why are we in Mexico, and what are we going to do there?

"Every phase of the Mexican situation," the President said, "is based on the condition that those in de facto control of the government must be relieved of that control before Mexico can realize her manifest destiny."

THE PEONS' STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM.

The President made it clear that the United States has no quarrel with the Mexican people and that the Mexican people should have no quarrel with us. He sketched the conditions in Mexico under Diaz and came to the underlying cause for all the unrest in that country for many years. This, he said, was the fight for the land—just that and nothing more.

He pointed out how the landed aristocracy, originally given control of vast tracts of land by Spanish grants, had during succeeding years, by coercion, absorption, and by other methods of force, and with the support of the Government, taken away from the small landowners most of their properties and had created the feudal estates, where the people were virtually slaves.

These processes were followed by the passage of a general law which made legal the condemnation of all land to the State that was not secured by a title which complied with provisions in the law that made most of the titles of the properties the landed aristocracy wanted easy of annulment. Farm after farm passed into the control of the big landowners, and there was no recourse for the former owners or for their families but to work at dictated terms and practically as slaves on the land that had formerly been theirs.

"Fortunately for the peons, but unfortunately for himself," the President continued, "Diaz permitted the establishment of a public-school system. He himself said he raised up the instrument that brought about his own destruction—the school system."

Weak and incomplete as this school system was and is, it nevertheless had the effect of helping in great measure toward the partial education of a sufficient number of the peons to make it easy for agitators to start revolutions. Revolutions were started. Finally there came the successful revolution of Madero and his supporters and the exile of Diaz. This was followed by the killing of Madero and the assumption of power by Huerta. The present revolution, like all preceding revolutions, is primarily a revolution by the peons who want to regain their land.

"To some extent," the President said, "the situation in Mexico is similar to that in France at the time of the revolution. There are wide differences in many ways," he continued, "but the basic situation has many resemblances."

After the accession of Huerta the President definitely decided not to recognize that alleged government and remained firm in that resolve. However, for many months he has not been unaware that a situation was developing which would force him to make an active movement against Mexico, or the alleged Huerta government of Mexico, and would bring about such a condition as existed at the time mediation was suggested.

"It has been a difficult situation," he said, "because so many elements of it have been without our control and our territory. In a domestic matter we can see our way clear, because ordinarily all the elements are within our view and consideration; but here was a trouble that had its active movements in another and an adjacent and a somewhat remote country, and we were forced to sit and watch and await such developments as might be. I have known for months that some such thing could happen—was inevitable, in fact—and my prayer was that it might not be a calamity."

Then came the incident at Tampico. Rear Admiral Mayo, resenting the insult to the flag, issued his demand for an apology, and the President and his Cabinet stepped in behind the admiral.

"Really," said the President, "it was a psychological moment, if that phrase is not too trite to be used. There was no great disaster like the sinking of the Maine, and there was an adequate reason for our action in this culminating insult of a series of insults to our country and our flag."

The President followed with his emphatic declaration that his passion is for the great masses of the Mexican people, and his statement that his sole object in Mexico is to help the people secure the liberty which he holds is fully theirs by right.

"The function of being a policeman in Mexico has not appealed to me, nor does it appeal to our people," he said. "Our duty is higher than that. If we are to go in there, restore order, and immediately get out, and invite a repetition of conflict similar to that which is in progress now, we had better have remained out.

"What we must do and what we hope to do are twofold: First, we hope to show the world that our friendship for Mexico is a disinterested friendship, so far as our own aggrandizement goes; and, second, we hope to prove to the world that the Monroe doctrine is not what the rest of the world, including some of the countries in this hemisphere, contends—merely an excuse for the gaining of territory for ourselves.

"I hold this to be a wonderful opportunity to prove to the world that the United States of America is not only human but humane; that we are actuated by no other motives than the betterment of the conditions of our unfortunate neighbor, and by the sincere desire to advance the cause of human liberty."

The situation, he pointed out, is intolerable, and requires the strong guiding hand of the great Nation on this continent that, by every appeal of right and justice, and the love for order, and the hope for peace and prosperity, must assist these warring people back into the paths of quiet and prosperity. We have an object lesson to give to the rest of the world: an object lesson that will prove to the skeptical outsiders that this Nation rises superior to considerations of added power and scorns an opportunity for territorial aggrandizement; an object lesson that will show to the people of this, our own, hemisphere that we are sincerely and unselfishly the friends of all of them, and particularly the friends of the Mexican people, with not other idea than the idea and the ideal of helping them compose their differences, starting them on the road to continued peace and renewed prosperity, and leaving them to work out their own destiny, but watching them narrowly and insisting that they shall take help when help is needed.

"I have not permitted myself to think of what will be the outcome of these plans for mediation," the President said. "I hope they may be successful. In any event, we shall deem it our duty to help the Mexican people, and we shall continue until we have satisfactory knowledge that peace has been restored, that a constitutional government is reorganized, and that the way is open for the peaceful reorganization of that harassed country."

THE POSSIBILITIES OF SELF-GOVERNMENT.

"We shall not demand a foot of territory nor a cent of money—except, of course, the settlement of such claims as may justly be made by American citizens for damages to their property during these disturbances—individual claims. There will be no money demand in a national sense. Then we shall have shown the entire world that the Monroe doctrine means an unselfish friendship for our neighbors—a disinterested friendship, in the sense of not being interested in our aggrandizement—and that our motives are only the motives inspired by the higher humanity, by our sense of duty and responsibility, and by our determination that human liberty shall prevail in our hemisphere."

The President paused. He had been intensely in earnest in his talk. He smiled, and his long white fingers wove themselves in and out. Then, with a little gesture that betokened amused contempt, he continued:

"They say the Mexicans are not fitted for self-government; and to this I reply that, when properly directed, there is no people not fitted for self-government. The very fact that the extension of the school system by Diaz brought about a certain degree of understanding among some of the people, which caused them to awaken to their wrongs and to strive intelligently for their rights, makes that contention absurd. I do not hold that the Mexican peons are at present as capable of self-government as other people—ours, for example—but I do hold that the widespread sentiment that they never will be and never can be made to be capable of self-government is as wickedly false as it is palpably absurd."

He paused again.

"Did you see that dispatch we gave out, from Consul General Hanna, which detailed his experiences with the army at Torreon? It was a sort of a diary of his adventures and a record of what he saw. We gave it all out; but the latter part of it was not widely printed, for the first part of it was full of bloody details of the battle. I suppose"—and he smiled whimsically again—"I suppose the editors felt there was no particular interest in the peaceful and gratifying information that was in the latter portion of the dispatch.

"Well, if you read that dispatch, you learned that Mr. Hanna was most agreeably surprised and greatly gratified by the treatment Villa's men gave their prisoners; how they endeavored to live up to the rules of civilized warfare; how they were constantly on the lookout for new information that would relieve them of the stigma of being barbarians. This merely shows that these people, if they get the chance, are capable of learning and are anxious to learn."

The President returned to the question of mediation and what it might bring forth, but has not information beyond the general knowledge that Huerta had accepted the friendly offices of the self-proposed mediators. I asked him whether, in the event of successful mediation, his plans for the betterment of Mexico would be carried out.

"I hope so," he replied, "for it is not my intention, having begun this enterprise, to turn back—unless I am forced to do so—until I have assurances that the great and crying wrongs the people have endured are in process of satisfactory adjustment. Of course, it would not do for us to insist on an exact procedure for the partition of the land, for example, for that would set us up in the position of dictators, which we are not and never shall be; but it is not our intention to cease in our friendly offices until we are assured that all these matters are on their way to successful settlement. It is a great and a complicated question, but I have every hope that a suitable solution will be found, and that the day will come when the Mexican people will be put in full possession of the land, the liberty, and the peaceful prosperity that are rightfully theirs."

President Wilson banged the desk again. His smile vanished and his face became stern and set.

"And eventually," he said slowly, "I shall fight every one of these men who are now seeking and who will then be seeking to exploit Mexico for their own selfish ends. I shall do what I can to keep Mexico from their plundering. There shall be no individual exploitation of Mexico if I can stop it."

He walked over to the big blue globe.

"It is a wonderful country," he said as he put his finger on Mexico, "a wonderful country. There is every advantage there for the peaceful and prosperous pursuit of happiness. Have you ever noticed that if you draw a line straight south from New York it will touch the western coast of South America instead of the eastern, and that it runs along by Chile and Peru, and the other countries on the western side of the southern continent?"

"Thus, with the Panama Canal running practically north and south, this brings these countries which have been so remote into close touch with us, and the commerce of this Western Hemisphere will brood over Central America.

"What we desire to do, and what we shall do, is to show our neighbors to the south of us that their interests are identical with our interests; that we have no plans or any thoughts of our own exaltation, but have in view only the peace and the prosperity of the people in our hemisphere."

The little clock on the bookcase struck 9. The President rose. He walked down the stairs with me, and took his hat to go across to his office, where there was to be a conference on the vexing situation in Colorado. As we parted at the end of the corridor he held out his hand and said:

"It will be a great thing not only to have helped humanity by restoring order, but to have gone further than that by laying the secure foundations for that liberty without which there can be no happiness."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 14189) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City, and I submit a report (No. 546) thereon. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the bill.

Mr. STONE. Let the bill go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 5462) to authorize the county of Barry, State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the White River in Barry County, Mo., at or near a point known as Goldens Ferry, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 547) thereon.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1060) fixing the date of reenlistment of Gustav Hertfelder, first-class fireman, United States Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 548) thereon.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13819) to increase the limit of cost of Federal building at Pendleton, Oreg., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 549) thereon.

Mr. SHIVELY, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widows and minor and helpless children of officers and enlisted men who served during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 551) thereon.

JAMES M. CAMPBELL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] I report, from the Committee on Military Affairs, favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 2256) to correct the military record of James M. Campbell, and I submit a report (No. 550) thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Kansas to the report.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider the bill. It is a matter of great importance to Mr. Campbell. Under the constitution of my State a man is ineligible to hold office, or even to vote as a citizen, whose military record is not correct. This bill proposes to correct the military record of a man who was in the service during the Civil War for more than two years, and, simply through the oversight of some officer, shows him to have deserted when he was "absent with leave," and afterwards joined the company and served honorably as an officer. He now holds the office of county commissioner of Kearny County, and has been threatened with removal by some of his political enemies simply because of this defective military record, which is no fault of Mr. Campbell's. I know Mr. Campbell personally and can recommend him as a reliable and responsible person and worthy of this consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have on the calendar, under Rule VIII, 22 pages of bills. I think the only way we shall be able to have the calendar considered in the future will be by not allowing any bills to be considered by unanimous consent until it gets so crowded that many Senators will be interested in it, and then we shall be able to get consent to have it considered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the consideration of the bill. It involves a peculiar case. The old gentleman who is the beneficiary is living in Kansas and has been respected for a great many years. He has held positions there, and it only developed recently that he was debarred from voting or holding office under the constitution of Kansas.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated I would not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He is now an officer of the State and subject to removal because of a defect in his military record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James M. Campbell, who was a sergeant of Company C, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 25th day of February, 1864: Provided, That no back pay or allowance shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas whether or not he can give us any assurance that the calendar will be taken up in the very near future.

Mr. THOMPSON. So far as I am individually concerned, I shall be very glad to have the calendar taken up at any time.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Kansas, however, has not conferred with any of his colleagues as to when the calendar may be taken up, has he?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say that I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill, but unless the calendar is taken up before very long there will be no bills passed here by unanimous consent.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, in that connection I will say that the naval appropriation bill will be called up just as soon as the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill has been finished. I have been hoping for several days to be able to begin the consideration of the bill, but could not do so because the Agricultural appropriation bill had the right of way, and it seems that certain features of that bill have provoked much discussion. I think, however, the Agricultural appropriation bill will be finished to-day, and the consideration of the naval appropriation bill may begin. I am, however, advised by many Senators, some of whom are members of the Naval Committee, that they are obliged to be absent this afternoon, and the request was made of me that I should not press the bill for consideration at to-day's session. My own idea is that in order to preserve its rights I should call it up, even if it has to be temporarily laid aside. It is possible, if that should be done, that the calendar could be taken up for consideration. I say this in response to what has just been said by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I wish to ask if there is a report on this bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is a favorable report, and also a report from the department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to have the report read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted this day by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (for Mr. THOMAS) as follows:

[Senate Report No. 550, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

JAMES CAMPBELL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (for Mr. THOMAS), from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 2256:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2256) to correct the military record of James M. Campbell, report the same back to the Senate with amendments, and as thus amended recommend that it do pass.

The records in the War Department show that he is reported to have deserted February 25, 1864. He enlisted November 15, 1861, for a period of three years. In an affidavit explaining the cause for leaving his regiment at that time, he states that owing to some difficulty with the colonel of the regiment the latter directed him to leave his regiment and promised to secure his discharge. At the same time one Capt. Robert C. Carter, of the same regiment, was also directed to leave his regiment. In support of an application for relief filed in the War Department by said Campbell, the said Capt. Carter declared as follows:

"That he was captain of Company C, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, in the late war of 1861–1865, and as such knew one James Campbell well, who was a soldier in said company and regiment. About March, 1863, while at Louisville, Ky., it became a military necessity for said affiant and said James Campbell to leave the regiment, which was done by special leave of Col. Dan Stover. No time was fixed for our return, as it was not known at said time whether we could return in safety or not. Afterwards a special messenger was sent by Gen. Andrew Johnson from Nashville, Tenn., to affiant directing that if affiant could not return in safety to his regiment that he should report to him at Nashville, Tenn. Nothing was said as to Campbell. Shortly afterwards affiant was notified by Col. Stover to return to the regiment, which was done. My recollection is that at the time I returned said James Campbell was employed in driving a Government team, and that his name was carried upon the rolls by order of the colonel down to the date of the capture of said regiment, October 3, 1863, at McMinnville, Tenn. After said time affiant resigned and knows nothing further of said James Campbell."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of James M. Campbell."

SOLDIERS' ROLL OF SENATE.

Mr. SMOOT. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the sundry civil appropriation bill which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the amendment was read, as follows:

To authorize the Secretary of the Senate to pay those officers and employees of the Senate borne on the roll known as the soldiers' roll, in accordance with the provisions of Senate resolution of July 14, 1911, and continue such persons on said roll, who are now designated as "mail carriers," "folders," "skilled laborers," "policemen," or by other designation, but who are now serving as messengers in and about the doors of the Senate and performing service exactly similar to those performed by messengers whose compensation is $1,440 each per annum, a sum sufficient to make their compensation at the rate of $1,440 per annum each, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, $5,229.50, which amount shall be immediately available.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On May 16, 1914:

S. 4553. An act to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina.

On May 21, 1914:

S. 5552. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson," approved May 9, 1914.

On May 22, 1914:

S. 5066. An act to increase the authorization for a public building at Osage City, Kans.

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress, the Thirtieth Annual Report of the United States Civil Service Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 23, 1914.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS IN INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

This bill is of vast consequence to the shippers of the country, and I have been trying to secure an opportunity for some time to bring it forward. As there is no speech on the tolls question scheduled for this morning, I thought the Senate might be willing to consider it. If the Senate will permit me, I will state in a word what the bill is intended to accomplish.

Prior to 1906, when what is known as the Carmack amendment to the interstate-commerce law was adopted, it was the rule by statute as well as by common law in most of the States of the Union that a railroad company could not limit the amount of recovery in the event of a loss or damage to goods being transported below their actual value. Such contracts were by the common law in most of the States and by the statutes in most of the States made unlawful. The Carmack amendment, however, which attempted to regulate bills of lading in a very proper way, was held last year by the Supreme Court of the United States to abrogate and annul all the laws of the several States with regard to this subject, on the ground that Congress having undertaken to legislate upon the subject, the legislation was exclusive and that the concurrent right of the several States to deal with the subject which existed before that time was terminated.

With this statement, Mr. President, I think Senators will be able to understand the general nature of the bill, and I suggest that my request for unanimous consent be put to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the bill read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to inquire how this measure came up? Are we still proceeding under the order of morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is still proceeding under the order of morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object, Mr. President, because we wish to press the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in order that Senators may have an opportunity to examine the bill, and in that way shorten its consideration as much as possible, I give notice that immediately upon the close of morning business on Monday morning I shall ask unanimous consent to consider the bill. It is a very important matter, in which the shippers of the country are intensely interested, and I think the Senate should give enough of its time to determine whether or not the bill should be passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have no doubt I will agree with the Senator from Iowa that the bill ought to be pressed, but the Agricultural appropriation bill has hung on for some time and we hope to get through with it to-day. That is the only reason for my objection; it was not based on hostility to the measure to which the Senator from Iowa calls attention, but with the view that we ought to get through with the Agricultural appropriation bill before we go into anything else.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest, however, that it would take no longer to do it at one time than another, and the bill is quite as important as the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Agricultural appropriation bill is before the Senate; it is pending before the Senate as the unfinished business—not technically the unfinished business, for I understand, of course, that the Panama Canal tolls bill is technically the unfinished business—but the Agricultural appropriation bill is the bill which the Senate has been considering concurrently with the tolls bill; it is partly through, and I am very anxious that we should finish it to-day, if we can.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course I yield to the objection, as I must; but I very much hope that when I bring the bill again to the attention of the Senate on Monday morning Senators will have taken advantage of the interim and made themselves so familiar with it that they will appreciate how important it is to the shippers of the country, and especially to the shippers of live stock, upon whom the railroads are imposing a most unjust and indefensible rule with regard to limitation of recovery.

The bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has certain amendments which he intends to propose to it which have been considered, I think, by the majority of the members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and which will not be resisted, as they are entirely acceptable to the members of the committee.

I think it will require but a very few moments to dispose of the bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, let us either dispose of the bill or go on with something else. We could have passed it by this time.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 372) was read, as follows:

Whereas H. R. 14330 is now pending in the Senate; and
Whereas it is desirable to know just what commodities will be excluded from importation under the terms of said bill: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish to the Senate a detailed statement, indicating all commodities the importation of which would be affected by said bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there is no objection to the resolution, I should be glad to have it considered at once, because it will take some time to prepare the information called for.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the bill referred to in the resolution is the one now before the Committee on Manufactures?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. JONES. I submit a Senate resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 373) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

1. The names, ages, and length of service of those employees in the department in the District of Columbia and in the post office in Washington City who served in any war of the United States and who have been demoted, discharged, or resignations called for since March 4, 1914.

2. The rating of efficiency of each of such employees on March 4, 1914, and the rating with which they were credited at the date of demotion, discharge, or when resignation was called for.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that the resolution go over until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States was printed as Senate Document No. 12 of the Sixty-third Congress. The supply has been exhausted and calls are being made for it in this inexpensive and convenient edition. I have received some of these calls myself, and I ask that it be reprinted as a Senate document, say 500 copies.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator making the request say where the copies are to go, whether to the folding room or to the document room?

Mr. WORKS. I am not particular about that. I should want the supply where it could be free for distribution.

Mr. SMOOT. Then it should go to the document room, and there it will be distributed as called for. If it should go to the folding room, of course, there would be hardly four copies to each Senator. I suggest to the Senator, therefore, if the print is to be made, that it go to the document room for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WORKS. I also suggest that the number be larger, say a thousand copies.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to suggest that to the Senator, because it will cost very little more to print a thousand copies than to print 500 copies.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is this an annotated copy of the Constitution or is it just simply the Constitution itself?

Mr. WORKS. I think it is just a plain copy. I have not examined it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is an annotated copy of the Constitution. I presume the type is already set from the last edition. It is an annotated copy, and includes the amendments down to date.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It would be a good plan to have it reprinted, then. I notice in the manual we have a very good annotated copy of the Constitution.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is the same thing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If it is the same thing, I think it would be well to have it printed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from California that he make the edition 5,000 copies. One thousand copies will go only a very little way. As long as it is in type, it will cost only a trifle more to print 5,000 copies.

Mr. WORKS. Then I make the request that 5,000 copies be supplied for the document room.

Mr. JONES. I suggest that the edition be made even larger, because the moment word goes out that we have had the Constitution of the United States printed as a public document requests for it will come in from all over the country.

Mr. WORKS. That may be so; but it has been published as a public document for a long time, and up to the present time there does not seem to have been any large demand for it.

Mr. STONE. What would be the expense of this reprint?

Mr. SMOOT. The expense of printing 5,000 copies?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is undoubtedly all in type now, so that it would be a mere question of printing. The last edition of the document was printed in 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. I can assure the Senator that it will come within the amount that a Senate resolution will cover, and will not cost very much, even if 5,000 copies are printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST MATTER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 363, by Mr. SMITH of Georgia, requesting the Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation of Transportation of Mails to report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice for one week from to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, by reference to the calendar I observe that no Senator has given notice of a desire to address the Senate to-day on the Panama Canal tolls question. If any Senator does so desire, however, I shall ask consent to have the bill laid before the Senate at this time. Otherwise, I shall not.

As no one seems disposed to speak on the subject to-day, I therefore do not make the motion.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the Agricultural appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in on page 40, line 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, after line 5, it is proposed to insert:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may, when necessary for the purpose of increasing the public benefits or public use of the national forests, rent or lease to responsible persons or corporations, for periods of not to exceed 20 years, suitable spaces or portions of ground for the construction of summer residences, hotels, stores, or any structures needed for recreation or convenience.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What Senator offers the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. I will simply say that this is a provision that was in the bill when it was reported to the House from the Agricultural Committee. It went out on a point of order. The sole purpose of it is substantially this: In many of the forest reserves there are what may be termed "camps," summer sites, that could be leased and would be leased if the Secretary of Agriculture had authority to do it for a reasonable time, and houses put up and looked after. The purpose of this amendment is simply to give the Secretary of Agriculture authority, on petition from proper persons, to make such leases as he may deem advisable.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not know that I have any objection; but I distinctly remember a debate in the Senate some years ago when it was said that certain forest reservations were made for the sole purpose of furnishing summer homes for certain gentlemen who liked that kind of a life. It does not seem to me we ought to make our forest reserves subject to that sort of criticism.

Mr. JONES. I do not know of any reservation which was created for that purpose or that exists now for that purpose; but I do know several reservations in my State and some in Oregon where there are small tracts that would be very desirable for use for this purpose, and the Government could get some revenue from them where now it is getting nothing at all, and the sites are not being used. They will be used simply by campers or summer people.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if any revenue is obtained, I should think probably the States that have been prevented from taxing any of these vast forest reserves might have what little revenue is derived.

Mr. JONES. I certainly should have no objection to the revenue going to the States, but the situation is just this: They are in the reserves now, and there is no chance of getting the land out; and it seems to me that if sites of that kind exist that could be leased in a reasonable way it would assist in maintaining them. I should be very glad to see the receipts go to the States, so far as I am concerned. I do not provide for that in this amendment, however.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to amend the amendment by providing that the revenue obtained shall be paid into the treasury of the State wherein the forest reserve is located; but I do not want to have that antagonize the Senator's amendment to which I have otherwise no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I notice that in the amendment there is no condition as to the amount of land that may be leased to these people. I suppose the Department of Agriculture might let them have a hundred acres or 50 acres or any other amount.

Mr. JONES. That is true, and that had occurred to me, and I spoke about it to one of the Members of the House who was especially interested in the matter. I should have no objection myself to limiting the amount. I have offered the amendment just as it was reported by the Agricultural Committee of the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. What amount would the Senator suggest?

Mr. JONES. I should say 10 acres.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will offer that amendment to the amendment, "Provided, That the amount shall not exceed 10 acres."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what is the matter that is pending in the shape of a proposed amendment?

Mr. JONES. I ask that the amendment may be read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] proposes the following amendment, to be inserted on page 40, after line 5:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may, when necessary for the purpose of increasing the public benefits or public use of the national forests, rent or lease to responsible persons or corporations, for periods of not to exceed 20 years, suitable spaces or portions of ground for the construction of summer residences, hotels, stores, or any structures needed for recreation or convenience.

The amendment suggested by the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is, on line 4, after the word "corporations," to insert "not to exceed 10 acres," so as to read:

Rent or lease to responsible persons or corporations not to exceed 10 acres—

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I submit that this is general legislation, and I make the point of order that it can not be added to an appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I admit that the amendment is subject to a point of order, but I hope the Senator will not make it.

This provision was in the bill when it was reported from the Agricultural Committee of the House. They considered it and deemed it advisable, but it went out on a point of order in the House, just as, of course, it would go out here. I hope the Senator will not make the point of order, however. The department, I understand, is very much in favor of a proposition of this kind, and, as I say, it was in the bill when it was reported to the House.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Washington——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us see, first, whether or not the point of order is to be insisted on. Does the Senator from Georgia insist on the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, my attitude with reference to it is this: It seems to me it is a far-reaching piece of legislation that ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands and be passed on formally and reported by them. I think I should vote for it, then. I do not know any reason why I should not; but I do not know enough about it at present, and I think other Senators are in the same position. Therefore, we dislike to see it added here unless we have a full report from the committee.

Mr. JONES. Let me suggest to the Senator that the Committee on Public Lands would not have jurisdiction of this matter. It relates only to land in the forest reserves, over which the Agricultural Department has control. This amendment was introduced quite a good while ago and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia insist on the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think I shall have to insist on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the Agricultural appropriation bill of last year an appropriation was made for the extermination of the boll weevil of $375,000 and for the gypsy and brown-tail moth of $300,000. In other words, there were $75,000 more appropriated for the boll weevil than for the extermination of the troublesome pest we have in some of the Northern States. This year the appropriation for the boll weevil, as it passed the House, was increased $3,240, making it $378,240, while the appropriation for moths was reduced to $297,540.

Since the bill has been under consideration an amendment has been offered and agreed to increasing the appropriation for the boll weevil $150,000, making it $628,240; but no amendment has been offered increasing the moth appropriation.

Mr. President, these two appropriations have heretofore gone along together practically, and while I do not ask that as large an addition shall be given to the item regarding moths as has been given to the boll-weevil provision, I do want to have some addition made to that appropriation, and I move to strike out "$297,540" on page 50, line 4, and insert "$350,000," which I trust will be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to consider for a few moments the merits of this bill with the idea of opening the way whereby amendments can be added to perfect it, that it may better protect certain sections of the country. I think those who have been zealous in looking after the interests of their particular sections in the bill may possibly, by running over a few of the items, find some place where they can get in an amendment to further develop conditions in their own sections; and this will be of interest to them. I notice on page 11, "for inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle and the inspection of southern cattle," $625,520 are appropriated. Most of this, I assume, will go south.

I notice also in the next provision, "for all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks," $400,000 are appropriated, "of which sum $50,000 may be used for live-stock demonstration work."

Mr. SHEPPARD. What page is the Senator reading from?

Mr. McCUMBER. From page 12. I call attention to the fact that all through the bill there are specific appropriations made for the southern section; and then, in addition to the specific appropriations, which are enormously large themselves, there are also general provisions, most of which appropriations will be used in the same section.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose the Senator from North Dakota recognizes the fact that we bring great numbers of those southern cattle into the State of the Senator and my own State, and we are as directly interested and concerned in the eradication of that pest as the people in the southern section. I trust that the Senator will not find it necessary to make any particular objection to that item, however much he may criticize the others.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope, Mr. President, there is nothing here that will not benefit the whole country, at least to some extent. However, the general provisions of the bill show that it is very top-heavy at the southern end. I look again, and I find on page 13:

"For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md.," $77,360 are appropriated.

Then for construction of buildings at bureau experiment station at the same place, $16,500.

I notice here "for all necessary expenses in the investigation of fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton," and so forth, a special provision is made and $37,000 are appropriated.

Then for the diseases of cotton, potatoes, truck crops, forage crops, $46,000 are appropriated, most of which, of course, will be used in the cotton belt.

Then for further investigation of the same crop plants $44,540 are appropriated.

Then follows, on page 18, I find, "for investigating the ginning, handling, grading, baling, gin compressing, and wrapping of cotton," and so forth, and the demonstration of standards, $180,580 are appropriated.

Then, on the next page, "for the investigation and improvement of tobacco and the methods of tobacco production and handling," $28,000 are appropriated.

Turning to the next page I find "to investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice," $400,000 are appropriated. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] showed that most of that was to be used in the same section.

We find, then, "for farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil," $628,240 are to be expended.

Again, on page 21, "for the investigation and improvement of fruits," packing, storing, handling, and so forth, most of which is in that section, $107,500.

Again, "for investigation of methods for wood distillation and for the preservative treatment of timber," for testing such woods, and so forth, which relates mostly to the turpentine product, the appropriation is $140,000.

Then "for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails," and so forth, $400,000, and, of course, the necessity for the construction of roads is, for the most part, within what we know as the cotton belt, as we have pretty fair roads in the North and in the New England States generally.

Again, "for chemical investigations of soil types," where it is worn out, mostly in the Southern States, there is $22,350 appropriated, and for the physical investigation, $15,265, and for soil fertility investigations, $32,700.

Then "for the investigation of soils, in cooperation with other branches of the department," and so forth, most of which relates to that section of the country, we have $169,800 appropriated.

On the next page, "for investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts," $58,000 are appropriated, most of which would be used in that section.

Then "for investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton," and so forth, $84,000. Thus we cover the boll weevil, which I suppose is an insect, and we cover again the cotton by another item. There are three or four of them, all relating to the same subject and all of which can be used in reference to the same purposes.

Then "for investigations of insects affecting tropical and subtropical fruits," and, of course, that is in that particular section, $20,100 are appropriated.

Again, we have the general expenses "to carry into effect the provisions of the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled 'An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplemental thereto,'" $720,000. The Senator from Iowa a short time ago showed that nearly all this would be used in this blessed cotton belt.

Again, on page 61, we have a provision "to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of the above acts," and another one of those acts, $50,500, relating again to the same subject.

Again, I find on page 65, "for inquiries in regard to systems of road management," and, of course, that will be used where we need roads and not where we already have them, $44,800.

Then "for investigations of the best methods of road making," which, of course, will be used in the same places, $145,000.

Then "for conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction," relating to the same subject, and, of course, to be used necessarily in the same belt, $60,000.

Finally for "experiments and demonstrations in live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned, or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the production and development of mules and other live stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States," another $100,000.

So, Mr. President, we have all these items specifically relating to a certain section, while all the other appropriations, general in their terms, will also be divided necessarily with the same section, because they are not limited either by the conditions or the circumstances nor by the words to any other section of the United States.

I simply mention these few items that those Senators who have labored assiduously for the benefit of their sections may possibly see wherein something has been left out. But in order that we may obtain a little of these appropriations in the Northern States I submit the following provision as an amendment to follow line 13, page 74, at the end of the bill, which reads:

Total carried by this act for the Department of Agriculture, $19,511,302.

I move as an amendment to that, Mr. President, the following:

Provided, That not more than four-fifths of the sums appropriated by this act shall be used in the cotton belt.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator that the bulk of this Agricultural appropriation bill is to be expended in the South is entirely unjustified. A careful examination of the bill will not sustain him. The bill pursues the same policy that has been pursued ever since the origination of the department. It follows in the main the same policy that has been pursued by the Senator's own party when his party framed these Agricultural appropriation bills.

The specific appropriations to which the Senator refers and which he says are expended in the South all added together are small when compared with the one item of appropriation for the Forest Service of $5,399,679, and this appropriation is expended almost entirely outside of the South.

Another great item of appropriation is for the Weather Bureau, an appropriation of $1,707,000, which is distributed over the country.

I do not think that the argument of the Senator is justified, and I move that the amendment be tabled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I desire to offer an amendment on page 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 18, after the word "seeds," insert the following: "The encouragement of bulb culture in the United States," and strike out "$166,500" and insert "$178,500."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator in charge of the bill that the department state that under the free-seed appropriation they have heretofore and are now maintaining a bulb farm, and that if the appropriation for free seeds remains stricken out they will either have to abandon that work or else require an additional appropriation of $12,000. I have a letter here from the department. I called them up by phone and spoke to them in regard to the matter:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, May 1, 1914.

Hon. W. L. JONES, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR JONES: Referring to your telephone inquiry this morning regarding the work the department is doing to encourage bulb culture in the United States, I beg to say that for a number of years we have been conducting experiments with a view to establishing the industry on the Pacific coast. We import large quantities of Dutch bulbs for congressional distribution. We have been hoping to produce these bulbs at home, and to this end have been using a small part of the congressional seed fund in conducting an experimental bulb garden in the State of Washington. It is very important that this work should continue. The bulb industry is a valuable one, and it is believed we can introduce it here. If the item for the purchase and distribution of seeds goes out, as recommended by the Senate committee, it will leave the department unable to further handle the bulb work. To continue the bulb work would necessitate an appropriation of about $12,000. If the work is to be continued, it is suggested that the item on page 22, beginning with line 17, be slightly amended, as follows: After the word "seeds," in line 18, add "the encouragement of bulb production in the United States";—

That is what I have offered—strike out "$166,500," in line 20, page 22, and insert in lieu thereof "$178,500," making the entire item read:

"For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds, the encouragement of bulb culture in the United States, and for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops, $178,500: Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $100,000 may be used for the purchase and distribution of such new and rare seeds."

Very sincerely,
B. T. GALLOWAY,
Assistant Secretary.

This is from Mr. Galloway, the Assistant Secretary. I should like to have this amendment adopted, so that the matter will go to conference, and then the action of the conferees upon it will depend, of course, upon what action is taken upon the free-seed-distribution item.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me? Does not the Senator think the amendment would be rather inconsistent with the action taken by the Senate, by a very decided vote, in striking out all the provision for the distribution of seeds and bulbs?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senate struck that out by a decisive vote, and now it is asked to increase the appropriation for the purpose of raising bulbs to distribute to Members of Congress.

Mr. JONES. No; it would come under "rare seeds." I do not think this item ought to have been taken care of under free-seed distribution.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In the letter which the Senator read it is stated that one of the purposes of producing the bulbs is for congressional distribution, and that we have decided against.

Mr. JONES. It is to develop an industry in this country. The Assistant Secretary says we are getting even the bulbs that are distributed now from foreign countries, and the main purpose of it is to encourage the development of this industry in our own country. I think it ought to be carried on under the item to which I have offered the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I observe in the House hearings on this question, page 163, Dr. Taylor speaks of the transfer of $6,500 from the congressional seed appropriation of last year, and says:

This latter amount is devoted to the maintenance of the bulb garden at Bellingham, Wash., in connection with the congressional seed distribution.

Is not that only devoted to the development of bulbs that are sent out in the free congressional seed distribution?

Mr. JONES. No; it is to determine whether we can produce the bulbs in this country. They are having good success in that territory. The indications are that the climate and the soil are especially adapted to them. Of course the bulbs that have been there produced have been used to fill out the congressional distribution.

Mr. KENYON. What I want to get at is if the Senator knows whether the bulb garden at Bellingham is used for any other purpose than the development of the bulbs that are sent out in the free seed distribution?

Mr. JONES. It is used not only to get bulbs for that distribution, but to determine whether or not the bulbs can be produced in this country.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator from Washington think the bulbs for that distribution are any better than the seeds that are sent out?

Mr. JONES. I will say that it is stated in the letter that most of the bulbs we are sending out for this free distribution come from Holland, but the writer also says the industry appears to be developing here; so that it shows that we can produce these bulbs here nearly as well as they can over in Holland. In my mind the important feature of this work is to show that we can produce them in this country.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senator from Washington noticed the paragraph directly preceding the paragraph to which he offers this amendment in the bill?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What is the distinction between the bulbs referred to in that paragraph and the bulbs referred to in the Senator's amendment?

Mr. JONES. I do not see that there is very much difference, so far as that is concerned, between the work to be done under the one paragraph and the work to be done under the other; but apparently the work has been carried on under the two paragraphs, and the department suggests this amendment be put in the paragraph to which I have offered it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the department consider the amount that is carried in the bill now sufficient to take care of all needs?

Mr. JONES. The Senator will know better than I; but, as I understand, under the act providing for the expenses of the purchase, propagation, and distribution of new and rare seeds the department has already planned the work for the objects which they recommend. Now, if they are going to take on some additional work, they will need additional money. The Secretary says in this letter that the work to which this refers has been carried on heretofore out of the free-seed fund; so that if we put this over into either one of those paragraphs it will require some additional money. I simply want to suggest, as I did a moment ago, to the Senator that if this could be put in the bill and go to conference, then the action upon the free-seed distribution matter would determine very much what should be done there. If you restore that item, then, of course, what I have offered here would go out.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am willing to leave the matter to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 68, after line 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

For the inspection of potatoes in those States where a quarantine has been or shall hereafter be established by the Secretary of Agriculture prohibiting the movement of common or Irish potatoes from any

State into any other State, District, of Territory of the United States except under such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of Agriculture, and for the enforcement of such rules and regulations, $100,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, this is an additional item under the paragraph for the enforcement of the plant and quarantine act for which an appropriation of $50,000 is provided in the bill. I only wish to say a few words in regard to the amendment proposed.

I have offered the amendment at this time and have not presented it to the committee, for the reason that the committee reported this bill to the Senate on April 16, 1914, and the condition which makes this item necessary, as it seems to me, arose on April 25, 1914, after the bill had been reported to the Senate.

In the year 1911 there was a shortage in this country of the common or Irish potato, so called, and some 13,000,000 bushels were imported into the country, largely from Ireland, from Scotland, from Austria-Hungary, and from Germany. Those potatoes not only came into our country, but into Canada. The next year it was found that those potatoes which had been imported were affected by a disease known as the powdery scab, which did not render them unfit for human food, but which, nevertheless, destroyed the appearance of the potato, made it malformed, and in its cankerous condition ate into the potato and destroyed it, so that the potatoes planted of this character yielded very much less, and the potatoes themselves were shrunken and misshapen, and the crop in every way much less valuable.

My own State of Maine, being one of the oldest States in the Union in its agricultural interests, has made something of a success in the raising of potatoes upon its northern border, next to New Brunswick. The total production of potatoes this year in this country as given by the Secretary of Agriculture is 331,500,000 bushels for the whole country, and in our State, with its small agricultural interest, we produce about 30,000,000 bushels, or nearly one-tenth of the total product of the country.

After the year of 1911 it was found that potatoes in Canada were affected by this disease known as the powdery scab, and a quarantine was established against some parts of Canada, against the whole of Great Britain, against Austria-Hungary, and against Germany. Last winter that quarantine was still further extended to include the whole of the Dominion of Canada and of continental Europe. Then up in our State, upon its northern border, in 1913 there were some evidences found of the existence of this disease, and on April 25 of this year the Department of Agriculture, acting under authority conferred under this act, established a quarantine against the State of Maine. I send the quarantine notice to the desk and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FEDERAL HORTICULTURAL BOARD,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I transmit herewith Notice of Quarantine No. 14, quarantining the State of Maine on account of powdery scab. This quarantine becomes effective August 1, 1914.

Yours, very truly,
C. L. MARLATT,
Chairman of Board.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
FEDERAL HORTICULTURAL BOARD.

NOTICE OF QUARANTINE NO. 14.

(Effective on and after Aug. 1, 1914.)

POWDERY SCAB OF POTATO.

The fact has been determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, and notice is hereby given, that a dangerous potato disease, known as the powdery scab (Spongospora subterranea), not heretofore widely prevalent or distributed within and throughout the United States, exists in the State of Maine.

Now, therefore I, B. T. Galloway, Acting Secretary of Agriculture, under the authority conferred by section 8 of the act approved August 20, 1912, known as the plant quarantine act (37 U. S. Stat. L., p. 315), do hereby quarantine the State of Maine, and do, by this Notice of Quarantine No. 14, order that the common or Irish potato (Solanum tuberosum) shall not be moved or allowed to be moved from the State of Maine into or through any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, in manner or method or under conditions other than those prescribed in the rules and regulations to be hereafter made and amendments thereto.

The foregoing quarantine shall become and be effective on and after August 1, 1914.

Done at Washington this 25th day of April, 1914.

Witness my hand and the seal of the United States Department of Agriculture.

[SEAL.]
B. T. GALLOWAY,
Acting Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. JOHNSON. The effect of that quarantine, as will be seen by Senators, will be to prevent the shipment of any potatoes from the State of Maine, whether those potatoes are affected by this disease or not. It is general in its terms and applies to all.

The crop of potatoes raised in our State in this last year, as I have said, amounted to about 30,000,000 bushels, and only a very small portion of that crop is consumed in the State—five or six million bushels, perhaps—and the rest is shipped out of the State, furnishing the one agricultural product of that State which finds a ready market throughout the Union. A large part of the crop is sent into the Southern States, to be used as seed, and into the South Atlantic States as well.

The people of Maine are interested that the potatoes which are shipped out of the State shall be entirely free from disease and sound; but we do feel that if one has raised a merchantable crop, a crop which is entirely free from disease, he ought to be allowed to move it from the State and to sell it; in fact, I very much doubt the authority of the Federal Horticultural Board, composed of a few heads of bureaus, to place such a prohibition and a quarantine upon the product of any State, making it exclusive. The power is great, and it might be used—I do not mean to intimate that it has been used in this case in any such spirit—but it might be used to shut off entirely and prohibit the shipment of a product from a State. Recognizing the fact that, under the Constitution, Congress has power to regulate commerce between the States and not to prohibit commerce, I feel that those who have merchantable potatoes, entirely free from disease, have a right to have them shipped in interstate commerce throughout the Union, notwithstanding this quarantine act; and the purpose of the amendment which I have offered is simply this, that the United States, having taken upon itself the task of protecting the planters of potatoes and the users of them in other States, doing it not for the State of Maine, but for the whole Union, should take upon itself the expense of a proper inspection of that crop, and that the farmer who has raised a crop entirely free from such a disease should be allowed to ship it from the State.

We are asking no help from the Federal Government in fighting that disease; the farmers of our State expect no assistance; we are perfectly willing to undertake to eradicate it, although we are not responsible for it, and it came in with the large shipment of foreign potatoes in 1911, from which the Federal Government received in duties between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000, poured into the United States Treasury.

The disease has only thus far manifested itself in two or three places in the very northern part of the State, but to prevent its further spread and to prevent this disease being communicated to other States, the Secretary of Agriculture, through this board, has thought it wise to place this quarantine upon the whole State.

What we would like, and what in this amendment I have sought to have the Senate provide, is the power to institute and the money to pay the expenses of an inspection. I have taken the matter up with the Secretary of Agriculture. As I have said, this quarantine proclamation was not issued until April 25, and the Agricultural appropriation bill was reported to the Senate April 16. I had no opportunity, therefore, to appear before the committee and present this matter. I spoke to the chairman of the committee in regard to it as soon as it was brought to my attention, and he communicated with the Secretary of Agriculture. I have here the letter the Secretary directed to the chairman of the committee, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 30, 1914.

Hon. T. P. GORE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: Answering your note of to-day, requesting comment on an amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maine, increasing the appropriation for the enforcement of the plant-quarantine act from $50,000 to $150,000, I understand from conferences with Senator JOHNSON that this increase is intended to provide sufficient funds to take care of a situation resulting from an outbreak of a serious potato disease in Maine. The State of Maine produces large quantities of seed potatoes, and these seed potatoes are sold pretty generally throughout the eastern United States. When it was found that the serious disease in question existed in Maine, quarantine measures were adopted and cooperative plans put into effect whereby it was hoped the authorities of the State of Maine might handle the situation. It has been found impracticable for the State to cope with the trouble, hence the desire of Senator JOHNSON that the Department of Agriculture, under the authority vested in the Secretary through the plant-quarantine act, be given sufficient funds to enforce the quarantine.

We feel that there is a question of policy here that the Congress should decide, and that is whether, in case of outbreaks of plant diseases within a State, especially where the disease involves a crop that must necessarily be sold out of the State, the State should be required to bear the cost of quarantine measures or whether the Federal Government should bear such cost. The department has no recommendations to make as to policy, and can only lay the facts before you for such action as the Congress may decide to take. In case it is determined that the Federal Government should assume the responsibility, our experts estimate that it will require at least $100,000 to accomplish the purpose.

Very truly, yours, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. JOHNSON. In accordance with that statement and the estimate of the Secretary of Agriculture, I have fixed the amount asked for in the amendment at $100,000.

Now, as to the question of policy, which the Secretary of Agriculture says he submits to the Congress, the policy of the Federal Government assisting in such matters certainly has numerous precedents in this very bill. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] this morning called attention to the appropriation of something over $600,000 for the prevention of cattle diseases in southern cattle; he stated that they were interested in that matter in Montana; and he called the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that his State was also interested, because cattle were imported from the Southern States to the Northwestern States. So I take it that in this bill not one section alone is interested but the whole country. In this particular matter my State is deeply interested; and while potatoes constitute a comparatively small product, it is a product that means much to our small farmers. It yielded them last year ten or twelve million dollars, and is perhaps the largest agricultural crop that we have in our State. If upon August 1, 1914, they find that they can not ship a single potato out of that State, it will be a serious loss to them.

So far as the State being charged with the duty and with the expense of making this inspection is concerned, that has not been the course heretofore pursued. In this very bill, in addition to what is provided by statute, you have provided $300,000 for meat inspection, which, added to the $3,000,000 annually appropriated for meat inspection, is to be used to certify the meat of the meat packers of the West.

I know of very little expenditure of money for the farmers in Maine. In the map which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] exhibited the other day you will find the State of Maine has not a trace of green or red upon it showing any assistance of any kind to the farmers of Maine in any line of agricultural endeavor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator whether this disease of potatoes came from our neighbor to the north or did it come from some European country?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is thought by the department that it came from seed potatoes obtained from New Brunswick. That is the statement in their report. It first appeared after the large importation of potatoes in 1911, to which I have referred. The disease first appeared in New Brunswick and in eastern Canada, and last summer it appeared in Maine for the first time.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, it is generally supposed that the disease came from Ireland, or from some other country across the water, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON. Originally. It has been known to exist in Europe since 1841.

Mr. GALLINGER. We seem to have just ground for a grievance against some foreign countries. These large appropriations for the extermination of the brown-tail and gypsy moths, which have been devastating the forests of New England, I believe, were made necessary by the importation of a few of those insects by a professor in Harvard College who was investigating their habits. He put them on the window sill and they blew out and scattered; and as a result it has cost millions of dollars to fight those pests.

I think the Senator's suggestion about the great potato crop of Maine, and the necessity for protecting it against an embargo, surely must carry conviction to this body; and I hope his amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thank the Senator for his assistance. He is certainly very familiar with the situation through Maine.

I am not asking that the amendment apply to Maine alone. It applies to all the great potato-raising States of this Union. New York is the largest one; Michigan is interested, and also Wisconsin. If there should be any outbreak there, it seems to me there ought to be some fund provided which would care for the inspection of potatoes.

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Just one word, and then I will yield to the Senator.

I only want to say, so far as the State of Maine is concerned, that we have no means of dealing with this matter. We have no session of our legislature until next January. The farmer will dig his potatoes next October, and he sells many of them in the field as they are dug. We have no means in the State to provide for the expense of inspection, and even if we had it seems to me it is a matter for Federal consideration and for the Federal Government to deal with. I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I expect to vote with the Senator, of course; but I am wondering whether that is one of the many results of extreme freedom of passing commodities from one nation to another.

Mr. JOHNSON. I may say to the Senator that those foreign potatoes came in when we had a duty of 25 cents a bushel, in 1911, and the Government got between three and four million dollars from the importation in the way of revenue.

Mr. WARREN. That is true; but I notice that there seems to have been a sort of coincidence; that we got along very well when it was closely watched and when we had inspectors and a reason for inspecting, while now that the bars are down we seem at once to have gotten more than we bargained for.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; but the potatoes have not come in in any quantities since 1911, and we have had very little reason to suspect that we got any of this from foreign potatoes, because immediately after the passage of the plant quarantine act in September, 1912, the Federal horticultural board placed a quarantine upon New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, the whole of Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, and Germany. That was in September, 1912. Then, last winter, finding that the potatoes which came into this country from Belgium and Holland bore some evidences of the disease, they extended the quarantine to all continental Europe and to the whole of the Dominion of Canada. Then, the disease appearing in the northern part of Maine, they have, as shown by the quarantine issued now, placed under quarantine the whole State of Maine.

I am not complaining of that. I believe that our people are interested in seeing that the potatoes they raise, and that they send out to be used for seed in the Southern States, where the white potato will not reproduce itself, and send out for table food, should be entirely free from any disease; but the farmer who has such a potato certainly ought to be allowed to ship it.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Did the ruling place an absolute embargo on Maine from shipping out these potatoes at all?

Mr. JOHNSON. The embargo takes effect August 1, 1914, upon the whole State.

Mr. WEST. I say, it is an absolute embargo, is it?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is an absolute embargo. We want the Government to have the money to inspect that crop, and then to make its regulations, and permit potatoes that are free from disease to be shipped from the State; but that will cost some money.

Mr. WARREN. Was that embargo placed by the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. By the United States.

Mr. WARREN. What is proposed? Is it proposed that the United States shall have the cooperation of the States, and that they shall stand their part of the expense?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will say to the Senator that the State has already undertaken to do what it can to eradicate the disease. We have not come here asking any help from the Federal Government in fighting this disease. We will attempt to eradicate it, but we have no money appropriated in the State for the purpose of making inspections or for the purpose of enforcing this quarantine act. In fact, it is not a State quarantine; it is a Federal quarantine; and it seems to me that the Federal Government, having put on this quarantine in the interest of all the people of all the country, should bear the whole expense of the quarantine.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator, so far as the Government's responsibility is concerned, except that I do not believe they should bear all of the expense. What about the future introduction of that and other diseases? Is it proposed to quarantine against those countries also?

Mr. JOHNSON. They are already quarantined against.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I supposed. It is not a new matter for the United States to cooperate with the States in fighting disease. We have had the cattle tick in the South, and we have had the sheep scab in the West, and all of that; but I think it is always required that there should be a certain cooperation on the part of the States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me ask the Senator a question. I sat here and voted, with a great deal of readiness, $500,000 to meet the ravages of hog cholera in the West. Do the States of the West bear any part of that expense? I voted here $400,000 to kill the southern cattle tick. Do the Southern States bear any part of that expense?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must not misunderstand me. Of course they do. Take sheep scab, for instance——

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, take first the statement in regard to hog cholera.

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment, please. Take the sheep scab. They will not go into a State for the expenditure of money unless the State itself will appoint certain inspectors and give them certain powers and provide certain cooperation. This is not an argument against the Senator's asking the United States to appropriate money; but if it came again, after we had made an appropriation, I should require that we have the cooperation of the States, not only as to working in harmony, but that they should stand some portion of the expense.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming, if the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, that no doubt the people of the State of Maine would be willing to bear any part of the expense which it was thought just and fair for them to bear.

Mr. WARREN. I think so.

Mr. JOHNSON. They have not been here very often asking anything for their agricultural interests or their lumber interests, and in this particular matter we do not feel that we are to blame for the large importation of foreign potatoes brought in here. We are not responsible for it; and the Government, having received in its duties that year between three and four million dollars, can well afford to bear now the small expense of determining whether or not potatoes are sound and healthy and can be shipped from the State.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Do I understand from the Senator from Maine that the Legislature of Maine will not meet again until next January?

Mr. JOHNSON. It will not meet until next January.

Mr. WEST. Consequently it could not take any action with reference to making appropriations for this matter?

Mr. JOHNSON. It could not.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad to answer any question I can.

Mr. BRADY. I will ask to have the amendment as proposed read again, so that we may thoroughly understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, after line 8, it is proposed to insert:

> For the inspection of potatoes in those States where a quarantine has been or shall hereafter be established by the Secretary of Agriculture prohibiting the movement of common or Irish potatoes from any State into any other State, District, or Territory of the United States, except under such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of Agriculture, and for the enforcement of such rules and regulations, $100,000.

Mr. BRADY. The amendment as proposed by the Senator from Maine simply provides for Government inspection, the same as the inspection of meats or anything of that character.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. I do not think it is usual that a State should be required to furnish any part of the money for that purpose. It seems to me the statement of the Senator is very convincing, that this money should be appropriated for this purpose. It does not apply alone to the State of Maine; it applies to any State of the Union.

I happened to be at a meeting called by the Department of Agriculture at which the Senator from Maine was present, and we discussed this matter very fully; and it was through the efforts made at that time that the quarantine against potatoes from foreign countries was put in force by the department. Now, it seems that the Department of Agriculture has decided that potatoes from Maine shall not be exported into other States. That being the case, it completely deprives the State of Maine of the advantage of the market that it should have. Since that embargo is placed there by the Government, it seems only fair that the Government at least should go to the expense of finding out whether or not the potatoes are diseased.

If out of the 30,000,000 bushels of potatoes raised in Maine only 10,000,000 bushels are diseased, it is absolutely unfair to the citizens of that State to forbid them to ship out the 20,000,000 bushels of good potatoes; and the State of Maine certainly can not enforce a quarantine against itself. For that reason this inspection will necessarily have to be made by the Government, and it ought to be made by the Government and the expense paid by the Government. The regulations should be such that in case the potatoes are found to be good and healthful they can be shipped to any part of the country; and if they are not that, the shipment should be prevented. There is no way that they can do it except through the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Agriculture can not make the inspection unless it has the funds to do so.

I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am very much gratified to be able to vote for this provision, which extends governmental inspection over a product outside of the cotton belt. I assume that the purpose and the basis upon which it is asked is that these potatoes enter into interstate trade, and, entering into interstate trade, a potato that is diseased would be a fraud upon the purchaser; and to prevent that injustice and fraud upon the purchaser it is necessary to invoke the strong arm of the Government under the provisions of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to give the proper protection.

Of course I am not quite able to see the distinction between a potato and wheat in the matter of inspection. I am simply gratified to know that there are Senators upon the other side of the Chamber who will concur in the proposition that any great food product being sent from one State into another which is infected or which carries a false certificate as to its character or quality ought to be prohibited from interstate commerce; and I am pleased to note that the specter of fear is not overtaking Senators on that side as they see an army of men in governmental livery invading the State of Maine to protect the rest of the American public against a scabby potato.

I think the provision is a good one, and it certainly is good in more ways than one. It not only will be effective and efficient, in my opinion, but it will be one little letter in the line of education toward the final conclusion upon the other side that where there is a great wrong that can not be remedied by the State, where there is a great injustice that is perpetrated upon the producers of a State by reason of the act of the department or for any other reason, where the influence can not reach beyond the borders of the State, the Government of the United States may come in and assist them under that very good provision of our Constitution, and one that has given us such great benefits, relating to the control of Congress over interstate commerce.

Having the Senator from Maine agreeing to that view of the case, with his strong Democratic proclivities, I hope many of the others who will not look beyond their State lines for any authority to control a product in their State may yet come to his own basis of conclusion.

I certainly shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I introduce a small amendment which I send to the desk and which was submitted to the committee. It is in behalf of a very good woman. They said they did not desire the amendment to be put on the bill, because they intended to promote her and give her the salary for which she is asking; but I see Dr. Galloway is going to go out, and I do not want to trust the matter to somebody—I do not know whom—who will be appointed in his place.

I therefore ask the Senate to increase this woman's salary from $1,400 to $1,600, to be the same salary that a man is getting in the same kind of business. She is very efficient; she has been recommended for promotion, and they say they are going to give her the salary, but I want to fix it in the bill.

I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he will not accept the amendment?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. KERN. Does not the Senator think this bill has about all the burdens it can carry?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am simply asking to give a poor woman $200 a year in a bill that carries appropriations of $400,000, $50,000, $200,000, and so forth, for various purposes, that Senators do not haggle over. It is these little things, as the Senator knows, that we haggle over. This is only a matter of $200. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he will not accept the amendment.

Mr. GORE. I shall not offer any objection to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows the facts. They have been before him, and the department has talked to him about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, has the amendment been referred to the committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was referred to the committee, and I have stated the facts.

Mr. ROBINSON. Was any action taken by the committee on it?

Mr. OVERMAN. Action was not taken, for the reason, I say, that they intend to promote her, anyway. Dr. Galloway, as I understand, said he intended to give her the salary desired, and it was not necessary to put it in the bill; but he is going out, and I should like to have it in the bill for that reason.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the character of work she is doing?

Mr. OVERMAN. She is recognized as one of the finest artists employed by the Government. She is an artist, and the only artist in the department. Whereas the photographer, a man, gets $1,600, this artist, of whom everybody speaks highly, gets only $1,400.

Mr. ROBINSON. What kind of an artist is she?

Mr. OVERMAN. She is an artist on glass. The Senator has seen in these great expositions illustrations of various parts of the country on glass. If the Senator will go to the San Francisco Exposition, he will see, or if he went to the Chicago Exposition he saw, most magnificent paintings by this woman displaying a beautiful panoramic array of scenery of our mountains, our rivers, our gold mines, and all of our industries portrayed on glass. That is what she does.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall not interpose any objection.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment now pending before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think the Agricultural bill is the proper bill to pick out particular individuals and vote them salaries. It is hardly a proper place for legislation of that kind. I therefore raise the point of order that the amendment is an increase of the appropriation without any estimate, and that it has not been introduced and referred to and reported by a standing committee of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course if the point of order is made it will be sustained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. REED. I send to the desk the following amendment——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside, and by unanimous consent the Senate will resume the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has sent to the desk an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of lines 17 to 22, inclusive, on page 53.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee has asked me that I do not press this amendment until another is disposed of. So it therefore may be temporarily held in abeyance.

Mr. GORE. The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] intends to offer an amendment, and as far as I am concerned I feel disposed to accept it.

Mr. WEST. I do not know whether the amendment is entirely in order at this time. It is, on page 42, line 20, to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$20,000," and in line 23 of the same page to strike out "Western" and substitute therefor "United," so as to read "United States."

Mr. GORE. If there be no objection, I should like to accept the last amendment suggested, striking out the word "Western" and inserting the word "United."

Mr. WEST. The amendment enlarges the territory to be considered, and it is for the purpose of using the roots, stumps, and wood of cut-over territory that we may do something with the by-products. At least in my section of the country there is a fourth of the timber that goes into the slab heap, and the people in that section are putting up stills for extracting turpentine and wood alcohol from stumps, roots, and by-products of the sawmill. The object is to make further experiments on that line. It is already in the bill, but applies to the Western States. I wish to apply it to the United States, and to increase the appropriation from $15,000 to $20,000, but it does not change the entire appropriation one dollar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the committee amendment has heretofore been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then, unless the amendment is reconsidered, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is not in order.

Mr. WEST. I understand if there is objection to it, it goes over; and I give notice that I will seek to amend the bill when it is in the Senate, if there is objection made to the amendment now.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I would object to having the matter taken up at this time, as it was not before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and we are acting upon amendments as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled that unless the Senate reconsiders the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to, the amendment of the junior Senator from Georgia is not in order.

Mr. WEST. I move to reconsider the vote in order that I may add this to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am interested in this amendment, having made the suggestion originally that "Western" should be stricken out and "United" inserted, but I think for economy of time the Senator had better let the matter go until the bill reaches the Senate. He can then move his amendment.

Mr. WEST. The only reason why I sought to have it amended at this time is that I may not be here when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. We will get through with the bill to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we will get through with the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 7, line 14——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] only temporarily yielded the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not know that. I ask the Senator's pardon. I did not intend to interfere with him at all.

Mr. REED. That is all right. Let my amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out lines 17 to 22, both inclusive, on page 53, in the following words:

> For all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., 847–848), relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, $50,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had the temerity on one or two occasions to suggest that it was not necessary to appropriate money to enforce this alleged law. I stated that applications had been made to both the Departments of Agriculture and of Justice to test the constitutionality of the law, and that those efforts had been fruitless. I therefore maintained that it is manifest from the conduct and demeanor of both of the departments that they do not have any confidence in the validity of the law. Because I thus insisted I have become the subject of the ridicule and the scorn of the Audubon Society and of that high priest of mercy, Mr. Hornaday. Also, I have been taken to task by certain of the great newspapers of the country.

Mr. President, if I did not think there was a principle involved I would not take the time of the Senate to discuss this amendment; but the proposition before us is whether Congress shall make an appropriation for the enforcement of a law so plainly invalid that the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture, both of which are charged with the duties of enforcement, have practically declined to venture upon a prosecution.

I affirm that the Federal game law was enacted in response to a manufactured sentiment created by an organized lobby.

Mr. President, I call attention to the official publication of the Audubon Society. That publication states in the March and April number of 1913 how the Weeks-McLean bill came to be passed. It declares that—

Since 1904 bills of this character have been constantly pending in Congress, and from the beginning they made a strong appeal to the imagination of the people throughout the country who are interested in the conservation of our natural wild life. This interest increased each year as the result of the wide publicity given to the measure by this association and other organizations which had to do with bird and game life.

The statement then goes on to tell how the movement was worked up and how the New York Zoological Society became a party to it. Then follows this:

The writer could name some of the members of this association who have individually sent out or caused to be sent from 100 to 200 letters imploring Congressmen to vote for the bill. One of our members, Mr. Henry Ford, of Detroit, became so stirred that he instructed one of his most able and resourceful employees, Mr. Glenn Buck, of Chicago, to spare no expense in an effort to arouse the people to the importance of securing the necessary congressional support. Mr. Buck sent out thousands of telegrams and letters, and in fact for several weeks employed a large force of stenographers in the enterprise.

The struggle for the passage of this bill will go down in the history of American bird protection as being the most gigantic single campaign ever waged for a bird-protective bill. The full text of this new Federal law is given below.

Now we begin to understand, with the millions of the Ford Automobile Co. embarked in this enterprise, with orders from Mr. Ford to spare no expense, and with the statement that thousands of letters and telegrams were sent out from that one point, why it is that so many of our Senators have been receiving these communications, and the light begins to dawn, we begin to know, that instead of this propaganda being a spontaneous movement it was manufactured from the first. A little more of that later on.

Now, Mr. President, connected with this movement is not only the zoological society referred to, of which Mr. Hornaday is an important member, but also the Audubon Society. The latter has an enormous membership—I do not know how many—and a large war fund. I read in this book the following:

Five dollars annually pays for a sustaining membership.
One hundred dollars paid at one time constitutes a life membership.
One thousand dollars constitutes a person a patron.
Five thousand dollars constitutes a person a founder.
Twenty-five thousand dollars constitutes a person a benefactor.

You will observe that it costs a heap of money to be regarded as "a benefactor" by those who constitute this organization. The activities of the society appear to have been about along the line of the lobbies of the Sugar Trust, the Steel Trust, and other concerns that have been engaged in promoting legislation.

In the January number of this interesting publication, at page 72, will be found this statement:

THE RECORD FOR 1913.

Just glance for a moment at what was accomplished by the association with the $10,000 contributed to the egret protective fund last year:

First. The passage of the Pennsylvania antiplumage law, which put an end to the business of the great wholesale feather dealers whose American headquarters were located in Philadelphia.

Second. The passage of laws preventing the sale of aigrets also in the States of Michigan and Vermont.

Third. The employment of field agents to locate colonies of breeding egrets in the Southern States.

Fourth. The employment of a force of 18 wardens, who so successfully guarded the 8,000 egrets in these rookeries that throughout the nesting season not over 12 of the protected birds are believed to have been killed by plume hunters.

Fifth. Secured a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of Congress, and later, with the cooperation of the New York Zoological Society, conducted a campaign of publicity and personal appeal which finally resulted in the passage of the Federal plumage law, prohibiting the importation of feathers of wild birds to America.

Then a few words of comment and comes this:

The association must have at least $10,000 at the earliest possible moment for egret protection work the coming year.

Mr. President, this society does not appear to be altogether an eleemosynary institution. It deals in large sums of money and in some transactions which may require investigation. I notice, for instance, that it has on hand investments in its endowment fund to the amount of $378,286.57. I notice further that they have in their schedule of expenses this interesting item:

LEGISLATION.

New England legislation, $953.52.
Massachusetts campaign, $741.06.
Expenses South Carolina, California, and elsewhere, $806.54.

A total of $2,501.12 expended in legislation.

But that does not include the egret legislation and does not include the expenses incurred in getting the McLean bill enacted into a law. I find disbursements as follows:

From the egret fund, $8,400.47.

There was a total disbursement last year of $82,347.

The egret fund ran to some $10,000. The campaign was systematically conducted by a lobby that was as thoroughly greased as any recently infesting Congress.

Here is an interesting article that tells us how some Senators and Representatives were seduced into amending the tariff bill:

The paragraph in Schedule N of the tariff bill, which plans to prohibit the importation of feathers and birds, etc., did not fare well at the hands of the Senate Finance Committee.

I shall not read it all, but the article states that—

The subcommittee, after having evidently reached a conclusion on the matter, reluctantly granted the friends of the bird a hearing.

"The friends of the bird." I want to emphasize that, because one of these friends of the birds I intend to address myself to in a few moments.

Mr. President, all through this literature appears the fact that there was a systematic movement along the ordinary lines of the lobby—the same kind of lobbying methods employed by the wool, sugar, steel, and other lobbies; the same means were employed to convince Senators and Representatives that there was a tremendous uprising, and with the same result which has frequently been accomplished by the concerns referred to.

Now, Mr. President, every man who has dared to consider these questions from the standpoint of the Constitution or from the standpoint of economics has been berated and accused of being the enemy of all bird life.

I insist that the true friend of bird life is the man who undertakes to secure the enactment of laws that can be enforced and not the man who demands the enactment of laws, or alleged laws, which will ultimately be stricken down, because all the time consumed in the passage of invalid laws and in testing such invalid laws is ultimately lost.

Speaking for myself, I have always been a friend of proper game preservation and conservation statutes. I have favored such legislation in my State, and I have always sought to encourage it. The States have the constitutional right to protect the game within their borders, and every step taken in that direction by the States results in good; but if we abandon State legislation and undertake national legislation, and the national legislation is without life or vitality or force—is, indeed, born dead—then we have lost all the time consumed in the enactment of such legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am under the impression since the debate occurred in the Senate on this provision that there has been a decision in a case in the eastern district of Arkansas touching the constitutionality of the act of March 4, 1913, designed for the protection of migratory birds. I have not the decision before me and I have not seen a copy. I know the case was submitted along about the time or a few days after the discussion occurred here, and I have heard, though I do not understand whether the statement is correct, that the act has been held unconstitutional.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator if that is not probably the case referred to in the newspaper clipping which I have here and which was heard, I believe, before Judge Trieber?

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the case. Is the Senator informed as to whether it was decided?

Mr. REED. I am not. I do not know whether the case has been decided.

Mr. ROBINSON. It can be ascertained by communication with the clerk of the court whether the decision has been made and what it is.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, until recently I was not aware that if a man saw fit to insist that in his opinion those who were seeking the protection of game were traveling along the wrong road he therefore ought to be denounced as a cruel and inhuman monster who desired to exterminate the songster of the field and the musician of the woods. Neither was I aware of the fact until I began an investigation how much arrant hypocrisy there is back of some people connected with this movement, not all of them by any means, but by some.

One of the New York newspapers saw fit to spend some of its valuable editorial space in lampooning those who had dared to utter their honest sentiments on this question. I do not intend to call the name of the individual, but the editor of one of those papers has had an interesting sort of game experience which ought to qualify him somewhat as an expert. On June 14, 1904, he was charged with killing antelope in one of the Western States contrary to the laws of that State. He pleaded not guilty. He withdrew his plea on the 28th and pleaded guilty, and was fined $500.

On August 19 he was charged with killing mountain sheep out of season. He plead not guilty. He secured various continuances, and on November 28 entered a plea of guilty, and was fined $500 more.

It really seems to me that a man who has so little respect for the game laws of a State that are valid and are binding that he is willing to pay a thousand dollars for the privilege of violating them ought not to very harshly criticize those who merely insist that a law believed to be unconstitutional ought to be tested in the courts before large sums of money are appropriated for the purpose of enforcing it.

Nor do I think it is quite in keeping with the harmonies of this occasion that everybody should be abused as the enemy of wild life who has insisted upon following the provisions of the Constitution of the United States nor that the men who stand upon those provisions and assert their rights should be held up to the country as traitors to the Government.

Game associations of my State and adjoining States, composed of some of the best citizens of those States, men who have spent large sums of money in seeking to protect game, believing this law to be unconstitutional and a failure, said so, whereupon they were denounced as guilty of treasonable practices by one William T. Hornaday. That gentleman constitutes himself the chief apostle of mercy and kindliness. He denounces every man who shoots a duck as a pothunter, and holds him up before the country as a merciless wretch who seeks to inflict pain and misery upon wild animals. One would think, as he reads the fulminations of this gentleman, that his heart overflows with pity, that in his tender hands is held a chalice filled with tears of agony wrung from his sympathetic eyes by the suffering of dumb brutes; one would imagine that all his life Brother Hornaday had guarded birds' nests; that he had watched to see that no hand of violence was laid upon any dumb animal, particularly if that animal was a wild animal; one would believe that his finger never pulled the trigger that sent a deadly missile into the body of a living thing. Dr. Hornaday is, as has been suggested to me by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the self-appointed universal game warden; he is the archangel of mercy; he is the prototype of all that is tender and sweet and gentle and lovely.

But long ago it was said, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book," and Brother Hornaday has been engaged in the book business.

I desire to call attention to the fact that, if his heart is now tender and his soul is now shocked at the sight of a dead bird; if he has come to believe that those who occasionally shoot game are monsters engaged in the service of the devil and devoting their lives to acts of atrocity—if that is his present opinion—then, Mr. President, he has undergone a regeneration that has never been equaled since St. Paul saw the light that transformed him from pagan into a Christian. This book that I am calling attention to, and now advertising, is entitled "Two Years in the Jungle," by Hornaday. It is dedicated, as a book of its kind never should be dedicated, "To my good wife, Josephine." It is the bloodiest record in all the annals of time; every page of it drips with gore.

It reads like the diary of the foreman of a slaughterhouse. As one peruses its pages he can see the ghostly procession of slaughtered animals marching toward untimely graves; he can hear the sharp crack of Hornaday's rifle; he can distinguish Hornaday's shout of triumph as it mingles with the death groans of the slaughtered. According to Hornaday he has killed everything that walks on two feet, except men, and he has come mighty near killing them. He has even descended to the ignoble business of robbing birds' nests.

He did all this not for love of sport, but he had embarked in the business of killing and skinning as a means of livelihood, by which, I understand, he became a sort of "Hessian pothunter." He claims to have been actuated by interest of science; but, as I shall show you, the dominant motive in his heart, the inspiring sentiment that sent him out through swamps and morasses, and led him to expose his body to the fatigue of the march and to the ravishment of disease, was a pure, unadulterated lust for blood and money. Out of his own mouth, or his own book, which is very much the same thing, not out of mine, let him be condemned.

I begin with the smaller matters, Mr. President—birds—because if there is anything that shocks this sensitive soul it is to learn that a duck has been shot, unless he shot it. On page 75 of this interesting book I find this:

Carlo and I fell to work on our specimens and before night the "bag" received an addition of one saras crane, three spoonbills, three black-backed geese, shot by my friend.

On page 76 I find this:

At the end of seven days' shooting we had accounted for 15 gazelle and one nil-gal, not counting smaller specimens; and, sending my lot of skins and skeletons across country by bullock cart, I returned to Etawah by rail.

Why, this man killed animals and birds by the wagonload. He was not a "pothunter," he was a "wagonload hunter." He had to take a team of bulls around with him to haul the carcases of the slaughtered.

On page 379 I find this:

My native hunters brought me many fine specimens of mammals, a few large birds, many reptiles, and a few fishes. The most successful of all my collectors was a fine Dyak named Dundang, already spoken of, who shot four orangs, several rhinoceros hornbills, two or three proboscis monkeys, a wild hog, and quite a number of smaller mammals.

On page 380 I find this—and this man shot birds, too:

One day a party of Dyaks arrived from the head of the Sibuyau River, between the Sadong and Batang Lupar, bringing several fragmentary skins of argus pheasant, which had been taken off in native fashion for the wing and tail feathers, and also a live argus.

You may possibly imagine the heart of the man who so loves the egret must have ached, but I find no lamentations recorded here. On the other hand, he was glad to get them. But I proceed. I shall now quote from page 413—I am now confining myself as nearly as I can to birds:

I set Perara—

That is, a native—

at work shooting and skinning birds while I devoted my attention to mammals in particular, and everything else in general.

Anything; all was fish that came to his net; all was game that came within his range. Truly he was and is a tender-hearted, loving, kindly soul.

I encouraged the Dyaks to set snares for animals of all kinds.

This man denounces the pothunter. It is a mighty mean man who will shoot a bird that is not on the wing; it is a contemptible thing to sneak up on a bird and assassinate it from behind; but a fellow who will set a snare to catch unwary wild animals that harm nobody has sunk to a point so low that a real sportsman could not see him with a microscope that magnifies a million diameters. A man who sends out a lot of barbarians to snare game for him and afterwards gets himself up not only as a sportsman but as a regulator of sportsmen is in a class by himself. He certainly could take first prize in a contest of impudence.

I shall not read more in regard to birds, because, really, they are an unimportant subject compared with others, but at pages 417, 420, 421, and 430—indeed, throughout the book—you will find rhapsodical accounts of the slaughter and skinning of birds.

At pages 61 and 62 you will find where he let himself down the side of a cliff with a rope in order that he might rob birds' nests of their eggs. At page 430 you will find this statement:

It is so far my policy to shun small things that I do not even pretend to shoot and skin small birds.

Since then the learned author has evidently experienced a wonderful change of heart. "Not even a sparrow can now fall without his notice."

He was looking at something bigger at that time, but now he is undertaking to regulate every farm boy in the United States and to say that he shall not take a shot at a blue jay without being haled before a Federal judge. His viewpoint has vastly changed.

But I pass from that and come to acts of atrocity that are so indescribably inhuman that they shock even my hardened heart. In this book, at page 414, he describes the killing of gibbons, a species of monkey or ape which is so near the human that a man can not look at one through the bars of a cage without pitying it in its captivity. I want to read a choice bit or two from page 414:

We hunted far and wide over the hills, saw a great number of mias——

That is the local name for orang-outang—nests, but no mias. But we at last become absorbed in trying to kill a gibbon, and it soon developed into genuine sport.

Let no one rise and say that this man was suppressing his natural sentiments and killing because of his devotion to science; let all men understand that it was the lust of murder, if you can apply the term "murder" to the killing of a thing that is so nearly human that it is difficult to draw the line between some races of the human family and these highly developed apes. I continue to read:

About the only real sport I have yet had in Borneo, and this is about the character of it:

You are going along, we will say, at the heels of your Dyak guide, carrying your rifle in the hope of a shot at big game, while the guide carries your double-barreled gun. All at once you hear a slight vocal sound and a profound rustling in the thick branches at the top of a tall tree, directly over your head.

"Apa ini?" (what's that?) you ask in a whisper.

"Wah-wah, tuan" (gibbons, sir), says the guide in the same tone.

You take the double barrel, loaded with No. 1 shot, and peer anxiously upward to catch sight of the animal. Ah, there he is, on the other side of the tree, and evidently making off. You can not see his body on account of the leaves—

The doctor then states how he shoots at the gibbon; I can not encumber the RECORD with all the recital. He tells how the little thing, by its marvellous agility and its wonderful intelligence, escapes, and how he pursues it—

After a hundred and fifty yards, good measure, you stop short, cock your gun, and glare wildly upward to catch sight of your prey as quickly as possible. In three seconds your greedy eyes have scanned every tree top within gunshot, and at last you see some branches shaking a hundred yards away on the opposite side of a deep ravine.

And again the little animal escapes. This man was not hunting for science; he was hunting because he wanted to kill things. A little farther on he says:

But, all the same, you pronounce it genuine sport and acknowledge that you have met your match.

* * * * * * *

To hunt them is the most exciting work I have done for some time, violent exercise to be sure, but good to improve one's wind.

Which leads me to remark that it may have been at this interesting period of his life the doctor developed his ability to stand interviews and denounce game associations.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of those who love mercy, who feel that men who go out and occasionally hunt are brutal in their instincts, to this description of the slaughter of a gibbon. I read from the good doctor's diary—

November 3. A good score to-day. Just after I had finished measuring the mias killed yesterday—

That is, the orang-outang killed—and was preparing to set out for the usual morning's hunt, a troop of gibbons began whistling—their cry sounds like whistling, and is easily imitated—in the jungle close by, in fact, within a hundred yards of the house. Le Tiac and I were after them in less than a minute. It so happened that several paths had been cut through the jungle just where the gibbons were, and, by their help, we were soon close to our prey. We saw one or two of them swinging off in the distance, and at last I caught sight of a fine large one, feeding quietly on leaves, within gunshot.

They did not know he was there, so he assassinated them.

I fired both barrels to make sure of a kill and in a minute or so, as I was walking under the tree to see where my wah-wah—was, down it came with a heavy thud within 2 feet of me. A little more and it would have fallen on my head.

That is, the gibbon—

To my surprise it was immediately followed by another, a young one this time, which fell flat on its face on the soft earth a yard farther off. We picked it up and found it was very much alive, having only a wound in the neck, and Le Tiac held it while I reloaded and looked for others. The little one set up a terrible cry and kept it up steadily, which created a great commotion amongst the other wah-wahs. They were all running away, but on hearing the cries of the little one two came back and came as near as they dared, but kept so well concealed that I could not get a shot.

Think of killing an animal that was near enough the standard of man so that it would come back at the risk of its life to rescue its wounded companion. Let me read on. This humanitarian writes:

Then we carried the little one about and let it cry while we ourselves kept very still. It was perhaps a mean thing to do—

I remark that in this one instance this gentleman told the truth; but he might have used the term "diabolical" instead of "mean"— but in collecting necessity knows no law. Every wild animal must die some time, and gibbons are too valuable and hard to get for us to let one go through sympathy. Under all other circumstances these animals are exceedingly timid and flee at the slightest alarm; but this time two of them returned in response to the cries of one of their children in distress. It was a mean thing to do, I know, but when, at last, I got a fair shot at a large wah-wah of the rescuing party I disabled him so that he could not get away. He climbed to the topmost branches of the tree he was in, which was about 90 feet high, and I fired at him from below. I was surprised at the shooting it took to collect him—

That is, to kill him.

Altogether I fired seven shots with my No. 10 gun, loaded with 4 drams of powder and 2 ounces of No. 1 shot, before he fell, and, to my still greater surprise, I found, on examining the body, only one bone broken—a tibia. I expected to find the leg and arm bones mostly smashed to bits. The specimen was a large male, and met its death solely on account of its paternal affection, sympathy, and genuine courage in the face of danger.

Mr. President, I am not going to denounce Dr. Hornaday for this, but I am going to insist that a man who has been bathed in blood and who has allowed a wounded child even of the monkey tribe to continue its cries in order to decoy in the older ones of the tribe, so that in coming to its rescue they would come to their death—that such a man ought to cease prating about the protection of game or lecturing others upon the subject of cruelty.

Mr. President, in this book there is the recitation of the killing of innumerable monkeys. He hunted them; he gloated over his ability to kill them; he chuckled every time one died—a fine specimen to be leading the Audubon Society, marching with the gospel of mercy in one hand and the skulls and skins of a thousand monkeys in the other.

But, Mr. President, the dear doctor's appetite for blood was not yet satiated. He had killed a tiger—so he says; he had shot some elephants from ambush. I say nothing about that, but I want to call your attention to his slaughter of orang-outangs.

Mr. President, what is an orang-outang? Mr. Darwin, who is almost as high an authority as Dr. Hornaday, states that—

The orang, chimpanzee, and gorilla come very close to man in their organization, much nearer than to any other animal. * * * Both show in all their organs so close an affinity—

That is, man and the chimpanzee and orang—that the most exact anatomical investigation is needed in order to demonstrate those differences which really exist. So it is with the brains. The brains of man, the orang, the chimpanzee, the gorilla, in spite of all of the important differences which they present, come very close to one another. * * *

Again, as respects the question of absolute size, it is established that the difference between the largest and smallest healthy human brain is greater than the difference between the smallest healthy human brain and the largest chimpanzee's or orang's brain.

These animals are to a large extent subject to the same diseases as human beings; they contract tuberculosis from human beings; they are subject to many of the same fevers, and generally to the whole range of diseases which affect man; and they respond to the same medicines that human beings respond to. They have substantially every muscle and every nerve that the human being has. The question of whether they have a language by which they communicate with each other is one that is under dispute. People who live with them and know something of them regard them as at least "near human." I read now the evidence of Mr. Hornaday himself.

At page 350 he states:

In his own country this animal is universally called the "mias," although he is occasionally referred to by the Malays as an "orang-utan," which means, literally, jungle-man, from "orang" man, and "utan" jungle.

One would think the gentleman who wrote that would have hesitated about starting out to kill these creatures, but the very next statement is:

They, the native barbarians, assured me there were "mias somewhere in the jungle," but they could not tell me where to seek them. They thought I might kill at least one every week, which was quite encouraging, and I thought I would be satisfied with as good luck as that would be. I gave powder and lead to such of the Dyaks and Malays as were willing to hunt orangs for me, and started them out.

Now let us see what he did after he had started them out. At page 360, he tells about the murder of one of these "jungle men," for that is the term the natives apply to them:

Presently we saw a big, hairy arm clasping the trunk of the tree about 50 feet from the ground, but that was all. The boat was stopped directly, and, as we could do not better, I stood up and sent a bullet through the arm that was exposed, to stir the old fellow up.

Oh, mercy, mercy, truly thy home is in the heart of Hornaday!

It startled him, for, with an angry growl, he immediately showed himself and started to climb away. As soon as we saw his body, I fired again, which caused him to stop short for a moment.

Then the kindly doctor proceeds to tell how he shot this poor animal several times, and gives this description:

I immediately fired for his breast, whereupon he struggled violently for a moment, then made off in frantic haste, climbing along a straight horizontal branch by the aid of his hands alone, swinging along as a gymnast swings underneath a tight rope. He reached fully 5 feet at every stretch.

Presently he stopped short, and let go with one hand, which dropped heavily at his side and came below his knee. For three minutes he hung there facing us, holding by one hand only. How huge and hairy he looked, outlined against the sky! Presently his hand slipped; his hold gave way entirely.

How much this sounds like the description of a dying man—and with outstretched arms and legs he came crashing heavily down through the branches and fell into the water near us with a tremendous splash. He struggled up and turned savagely at bay, grasping the trunk of a sapling to hold himself erect. The Malays rushed at him with their parongs, and one gave him a fierce slash in the neck while I was shouting to them to desist. They were as yet wholly untrained and would have ruined the skin in a moment. The old mias flung his long arms about, gasped, and struggled violently, then quietly settled down in the water, and in another moment was dead. Then we towed him along back to the boat, lifted him in with considerable difficulty, and began to examine our prize.

Truly, he was a prize. His back was as broad and his chest as deep as a prize fighter's, while his huge hands and feet seemed made with but one end in view—to grasp and hold on. His arms were remarkably long and sinewy, but his legs were disproportionately short and thick—

And so forth.

Mr. President, one would imagine that a human being engaged in killing a creature so near his own kind would experience some pang of sorrow or some feeling of grief; but the description of the death is as cold-blooded as a Borgia would have written of the poisoning of one of his enemies.

I read from page 363:

Three orang-outangs in one day! The men hurrahed loud and long; and I believe I must have indulged in a little shout on my own account.

How it thrilled the soul of this sensitive man! Three creatures, so closely allied to the human family that some believe them human, slaughtered in a day; and over their dead bodies this tender-hearted lover of wild life indulges in cheers! The Audubon Society ought to get another partner.

Mr. President, I raise the question of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Kenyon	Perkins	Smoot
Brandegee	Kern	Poindexter	Sterling
Bryan	Lane	Reed	Sutherland
Catron	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Thompson
Dillingham	McCumber	Shafroth	Thornton
Fall	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Tillman
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Townsend
Gore	Myers	Shively	Walsh
Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Hughes	Oliver	Smith, Ga.	West
Johnson	Overman	Smith, Mich.	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have responded to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the waylaying of baboons coming to the rescue of the wounded young, and the slaughter of those possessing the heroism so to come, may have been a very sportsmanlike and a very humane performance, but it does not rise to the dignity of the incident to which I am about to call attention.

At page 367 of this gory recital will be be found a story that would shock the finer sensibilities of a first-class orthodox devil. The kind doctor gives an account of the killing of a number of these creatures and then tells this story:

Three miles farther on I espied a baby orang up in a treetop, hanging to the small limbs with outstretched arms and legs, looking like a big, red spider. It gazed down at us in stupid, childish wonder—

What would a human being have done—an ordinary human being; not one of these superlative people; not one of these leaders in the intellectual and moral uplift, but just an ordinary human being—when he saw that baby looking down with its stupid, childish eyes in wonderment and fear? It seems to me the ordinary pothunter would lower the muzzle of his gun. Not so Mr. Hornaday:

I was just aiming for it, when Mr. Eng Quee called my attention to the mother of the infant, who was concealed in the top of the same tree.

There they were, mother and child, so near like the human that even this man, as I shall show you a little later on, almost classifies them as members of the human family. If there is anything that appeals to the stony heart of man and melts it into kindliness it is the sight of a mother seeking to protect her babe. But what did Mr. Hornaday do? He fired at the mother.

As soon as I fired at her she climbed with all haste up to her little one—

She would not abandon her babe in the face of death. Like all the mothers of all time, the life of her infant was more dear to her than her own life; and so this mother, in the face of impending death, went to the rescue of her babe.

Did this gentleman stop then—this tender-hearted apostle of sympathy?

As soon as I fired at her she climbed with all haste up to her little one, which quickly clasped her round the body—

Ah, you good mothers who are furnishing money for Mr. Hornaday, what would you have done if your babe had been in danger? And what would your babe have done except that which this little orang did when it reached out and put its arms around its mother?

Which quickly clasped her round the body, holding on by grasping her hair, and with the little one clinging to her the mother started to climb rapidly away.

Oh, why did you not let her go, Hornaday? The mother fleeing with her infant, with fear in her heart, but the love of a mother dominant above the fear. Why did you not let her go? Why did you not lower your gun then, you lover of kindliness?

Fortunately we were able to get the boat in amongst the trees without much trouble, and all immediately went overboard. We had scarcely done so when a third orang, a young male, about 2 years old, was discovered looking down from a nest overhead, which he immediately left and started to follow the old mother—

You see, this old mother had a family.

As he went swinging along underneath a limb, with his body well drawn up, I gave him a shot which dropped him instantly, and then we turned our attention to the female—

They had slaughtered the young son of the family now, and still the old mother and the baby were to be hunted down—

She was resting on a couple of branches, badly wounded—

But she had not left her baby yet; the baby was still clinging to her.

She was resting on a couple of branches, badly wounded, with her baby still clinging to her body in great fright. Seeing that she was not likely to die for some minutes I gave her another shot * * * and then she came crashing down through the top of the small trees and fell into the water, which was waist deep.

We sprang to secure the baby—

And they captured it.

Then he recites in this book what they did with this mother orang-outang and what they did with the baby, and here is what they did. He tells it at page 369, the next page. They killed three of these semihuman beings that day, and then this statement is found:

Mr. Eng Quee placed a table for me and there I skinned the orangs and received deputations of natives who came bringing specimens, or wanting gunpowder. The ground under the house was hard, dry, and clean, and my motley crew of assistants retired under the floor with their work. Mr. Eng Quee quite enjoyed the novelty of orang skinning, and quickly became an expert hand at the business.

You see, they skinned so many that an amateur could develop into an expert.

Mr. President, some people will say this was in the interest of science, the love of learning, the pursuit of a highly intellectual occupation which probably harrowed the soul of this tender creature, Hornaday. But, behold, he exposes his heart to us. He lays bare his soul. He describes his sentiments. He pictures for us the thrill that went through him as his knife cut the skin of these almost human creatures:

At page 370 he says:

Two hours later the little baby orang relieved me of all anxiety on its account by dying. * * * This made seven dead orangs, big and little, to skin and skeletonize in one day!

Would not one creature have done in the interest of science? If you had to go out and murder something that was almost human, could you not be satisfied with one or two? No! Seven. And could you not have skinned them, if you must skin them, with a sickening sensation in your stomach? Not so Hornaday.

This made seven dead orangs, big and little, to skin and skeletonize in one day!

The mother, and her babe, and her eldest born, and four others.

I had adult specimens of both species, male and female, and two young ones; and, by a happy coincidence, the Chinese, Dyaks, and Malays had almost made a dead heat in the race after specimens.

Now, listen, and let no man hereafter say that this man did with reluctance these acts in the interest of science. Let him rather attribute it to a thirst for blood, a love of cruelty, and a monstrous disposition which found joy in tearing the skin from that quivering flesh. Here are his own words:

There are many good people who are at a loss to understand how a naturalist "can bear to skin and cut up dead animals," no matter how rare and interesting they are. Many wonder how he can have "an appetite to eat," and cry out in holy horror at sight of the raw flesh under his knife. Well, tastes differ; that's all. As for myself, I would not have exchanged the pleasures of that day, when we had those seven orangs to dissect, for a box at the opera the whole season through.

Truly, tastes differ. Truly, there are people in this world who would rather sit at the opera and observe the wonderful portrayal of human emotions, listen to the melody of music, and see the matchless mimicry of the actor—truly, there are some who would prefer that to the slaughter of mother orang-outangs with their babes upon the breast, or even to the delectable and high-toned occupation of skinning them afterwards. This man is reading lectures to the people of the United States on questions of morality and humanity.

And now I get a little key to his delight. Surely it is found in this sentence of the same account:

It was the most valuable day's work I ever did, for the specimens we preserved were worth, unmounted, not less than $800.

Now you know the mainspring of his delight—the source of his almost divine elation. It lay in the fact that he had made $800 that day killing seven of these poor creatures, including the slaughter of the poor mother as she went to the defense of her babe.

I trust the women of this country who are supporting this society and kindred societies will hereafter employ people who have the right to take the name of mercy on their lips without defiling the holy word.

Now, Mr. President, what was the doctor's viewpoint? If he believed these creatures were merely animals—if he thought them but dumb brutes, beasts utterly dissimilar to the human family—we might in charity excuse his cruelty upon the plea that he did not appreciate the enormity of his deeds. But what was his viewpoint? I shall not take the time to read it, but I shall put into the RECORD the citations to the pages where he describes a baby orang he had in captivity. He states that it so resembled a human that he called it "the old man." He describes how it played about his feet; how it nestled in his arms; how it ate at his table; how it insisted upon sleeping on his bed with him at night; how it followed him about and clung to his garments; how it looked at him with human eyes; how it played with its toes as a baby plays with its toes; and yet after that he went on killing these creatures. See pages 417, 419, 428, 429.

But his own opinion as to what they are and how nearly human they are is found on page 407. Let me read it:

> We will not say anything about the place the orang has in the long chain of evolution; but, while abstract argument leads hither and thither, according as this or that writer is most ably gifted for the same, there is still one argument or influence to which every true naturalist is amenable, and which no one will ignore who has studied, from nature, any group of typical forms. Let such a one (if, indeed, one exists to-day), who is prejudiced against the Darwinian views, go to Borneo. Let him there watch from day to day this strangely human form in all its various phases of existence. Let him see the orang climb, walk, build its nest, eat, drink, and fight like a human rough. Let him see the female suckle her young and carry it astride her hip, precisely as do the coolie women of Hindustan. Let him witness their human-life emotions of affection, satisfaction, pain, and rage—let him see all this, and then he may feel how much more potent has been this lesson than all he has read in pages of abstract ratiocination.

Why, he declares them almost human. He indorses the thought of Darwin, which some of us do not, that they are the progenitors of our race, and yet having such an opinion he continued the slaughter of these creatures. Finally, having murdered, I do not know how many, because every page for many pages records the death of one or more, we find that he did not even stop with killing the animal that was born. At page 403 he tells us something else:

> The size of the young of the orang at birth is quite remarkable, considering the small stature of the adult female. My twenty-eighth specimen was a gravid female 3 feet 8¾ inches in height, carrying a fetus which weighed 7 pounds 3 ounces and was, of course, fully developed.

Thus it appears that our humane friend indulged also in the crime of infanticide, if we can apply that to the slaughtering of creatures of this kind.

Mr. President, I am willing to be taught the lessons of mercy. I am willing to be taught by every man who wants to protect the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air and the fishes of the sea, whose heart goes out in kindly sympathy for the dumb animal that can not defend itself, but I am not willing to go to school to Mr. Hornaday, and I am not willing that the funds he collects and spends shall be used to effect legislation in this body.

I called attention to the ineffable delight the doctor manifested when he made $800 in one day in killing orang-outangs and to the thought that probably it was the $800 more than the advance of science that so thrilled his gentle soul. But I notice another statement which may furnish a further incentive and reason for his recent activities. In the New York Times of May 14, 1914, there is an editorial soundly criticizing those who dared to differ from Dr. Hornaday and paying its compliments to myself because I referred to this gentleman as either insane or a common slanderer or a common scoundrel; and the writer states:

> Senator Reed's feelings will not be assuaged at learning that Mrs. Russell Sage sent yesterday to Dr. Hornaday her check for $10,000 as a subscription to the permanent wild life protection fund that he has been raising "for use on the firing line."

And, as is explained in the other literature, "for use on the firing line" is to fire influence into Congress here.

> That makes the subscription to the fund $25,000. Dr. Hornaday is out after $25,000 more, and he is pretty sure to get it.

Says this writer: Well, I can understand how a man who finds more delight in counting the carcasses of dead orangs out in the forest, in stretching them upon his table, in whetting his skinning knife, in plunging the knife into the bodies of the almost human creatures, than he would have in the possession of a box at the opera for an entire season, and who gives us the key to his delight by the statement that the carcasses were worth $800, should grow exceedingly enthusiastic, exceedingly tender-hearted, exceedingly interested in the wild life of the country if he were to have a $50,000 fund placed in his hands.

I say this to the good people who desire to protect game life, that I, in common with all the Members of the Senate, stand ready to further every honest and proper effort to protect our game, the little birds of the field, as well as the game birds, and that we will join in all proper efforts in that behalf. But I beg of the mothers of this land, before they appoint as their agent and representative a man to look after the sparrows and the meadow larks and the bobolinks, to inquire whether that man wants money or his heart is in his work; and when they seek to determine whether he is really an evangel of mercy, to inquire whether he is the same man that shot mother orang-outangs as they went to the rescue of their babes, who tore from the womb of mother orang-outangs the fœtus that he might gloat over it, and who preferred the skinning of orang-outangs to a box in the opera.

It is conceivable that Benedict Arnold might have indited a dissertation upon patriotism; that Lucretia Borgia might have uttered a peon to mercy; that Judas, with the money of betrayal in one hand and a rope with which to hang himself in the other, might have the impudence to deliver a lecture upon fidelity; but it is hardly conceivable that a man who had written a book portraying his delight as he slaughtered these creatures that are so close to the human family that naturalists have difficulty in drawing the line of demarcation should be made the recipient of donations of those who desire to protect birds and animals.

Mr. President, I proceed no further lest I might be justly accused of having imitated the practices of Dr. Hornaday.

I venture a suggestion: Instead of giving Dr. Hornaday $50,000 to use in procuring the enactment of an unconstitutional statute, why not employ these funds to feed the starving children of our great cities?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. ROBINSON. While the Senator from Missouri was speaking he was asked about the decision of the case pending in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas affecting the validity of the migratory-bird law. I am informed by the clerk of the Committee on Agriculture that the Biological Survey has received a telegram stating that the act has been held unconstitutional in the case referred to in the remarks of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas by what court it was held that the law to which he refers was unconstitutional, if he has that information?

Mr. ROBINSON. I stated that it was the United States District Court for the Eastern District of the State of Arkansas, where, in the case referred to during the discussion on this subject some weeks ago, the law was held to be unconstitutional.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator from Arkansas the finding of the court?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not seen the decision.

Mr. REED. I may say, for the benefit of the Senator from New Hampshire, that while I have not seen the decision, I read a newspaper account which I had with me here, but which the Reporter has taken away, of the issues in the case. An arrest was made, and a demurrer to the indictment was filed upon the one ground that it was an invasion of the power of the State by the Federal Government, because the game within the State was subject only to the laws of the State. The case was decided upon a demurrer and upon argument. The account that I had gave the history of the case, but at that time it had not been decided. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] now, however, has the information in regard to its decision.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if it should appear that the courts of the country are going to decide legislation unconstitutional because the Federal Government invades the States, I am afraid that about nine-tenths of our legislation will go by the board if the issue is raised. The pending bill would go glimmering; there would not be anything left of it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, if the proceedings in Congress are to be governed by the great variety of conflicting judicial declarations which come from the Federal district courts, I think our procedure here would be halted very frequently and left in grave uncertainty. You can find decisions in one district and decisions in another district and decisions in still another district, and until they are harmonized and supervised by the higher courts, I think it would be very unwarranted for us to delay proceedings here on account of them.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have scarcely anything to add to what has already been stated, but I do not think the decision of the district court to the effect that this law is unconstitutional is sufficient warrant for our supporting this amendment at this time. It is largely a question as to who is interested. I briefly call attention to just one paragraph in an article on the treaty-making power under the Constitution of the United States, which, it seems to me, would apply to a case of this kind.

Mr. St. George Tucker says:

> In matters in which all are equally interested the Federal Government acts for all. In matters in which localities only are interested, no other power is permitted to interfere. In national affairs, we are a unit; in local matters, we represent 48 distinct and independent units, with laws, institutions, social customs, religious affinities, and aspirations as distinct as the billows. The strength of our Government has been from the beginning in the recognition of these two principles—not antagonistic, but mutually helpful—and while there have been, undoubtedly, in our history difficulties in adjusting the exact line dividing these powers, yet it must be admitted that the Supreme Court, with even-handed justice, has maintained the equilibrium without a jar to the great fabric, and has faithfully repelled the aggressions by each upon the other with steady and even-handed justice.

Here "all are equally interested." I wish to say, Mr. President, that the cases arising under the migratory-bird law are quite different from the cases supposed when the matter was previously under discussion in the Senate. The migratory bird is not property in the sense in which real property having its situs in a State or in which personal property having its location and situs in a State is property, and in regard to the alienation, disposition, or control of which Congress may not legislate. It is not the property of the State or anybody within a State until it is killed, or until it is subdued, at least. Here are the people of the various States of the Union interested at different times during the year in the migratory birds coming into or passing over their States. The interest, Mr. President, can not be confined to any particular State or to any particular locality. The people of the country generally have an interest in the protection of birds against the wantonness with which they may be slaughtered under the laws of some particular State.

While I am not prepared to say that I have entire and absolute confidence in the constitutionality of this law, yet I believe there are more reasons for believing that the Supreme Court will finally sustain it than there are against the validity of the law.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I voted against the committee amendment to reduce this appropriation from the $50,000 given by the House to $10,000 recommended by the committee for the reason that I considered that the constitutionality of the provision could be tested just as well under a $50,000 clause as under a $10,000 clause; but if it were declared constitutional, we should then have $50,000 to carry the law along in successful operation.

I have never said whether I did or did not think this law constitutional, and I can not say that I think it is constitutional or unconstitutional, because I have not given sufficient attention to that branch of the subject to enable me to do so; but I am most heartily in favor of the law. I know it will do good down in my section of the country; I believe it would do good in every part of the country, and I sincerely hope that it will be found to be constitutional. The fact that an inferior court has held it to be unconstitutional will not operate in the slightest degree on my mind to make me vote in favor of the amendment. I sincerely hope that it will be voted down.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has seen fit to propose this amendment at this time. It is late Saturday afternoon, and after the Sergeant at Arms had been instructed to request the presence of absent Senators we were able to develop a bare quorum of 49 Senators. Of course that is not a voting quorum; many of those Senators are paired with Senators who are absent, and many Senators are absent this afternoon over the week end.

This matter has been considered at great length in the House of Representatives, and was included in the House bill as it came to the Senate. The matter was further considered at length, both upon its merits and as to the amount of the appropriation, as in Committee of the Whole, by the Senate. Many of the Senators who participated in that discussion are not here; and this amendment, I am sure, will come as a surprise to them, as it does to me. I want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the committee, who is in charge of this bill, if this matter can not be allowed to go over? I have no disposition to embarrass the Senator by suggesting the absence of a quorum or by attempting to procure an adjournment of the Senate or delaying the bill if this particular amendment may be reserved until Monday, when I am sure that Senators will be back here.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that if any such exigency as he suggests arises as in Committee of the Whole, he can renew his suggestion when the bill goes into the Senate this afternoon. It has been my earnest hope and the hope of a great many other Senators that the bill would finally pass this afternoon; and I think we ought to be able to secure its final passage to-day. I apprehend that possibly the emergency which the Senator contemplates will not arise when the vote is taken, and I would not like to make any agreement of that sort now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator can not see his way clear to agree to the reservation of this proposed amendment, because the emergency to which I have alluded has already risen. The emergency consists in the fact that the Senator from Missouri has offered an amendment, which is now pending.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, what I had in my mind was this: If the Senator's amendment should prevail as in Committee of the Whole, then when the bill goes into the Senate the Senator from Connecticut can renew his suggestion; but if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri fails, there is no reason for the suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In response to the Senator from Oklahoma, and in view of my disposition to do all I can to expedite the passage of the bill, I will say that if the Senator from Missouri will withhold his amendment until the bill gets into the Senate I will withdraw from any contemplated proceedings that I had in mind for securing delay. I assume that all the Senator from Missouri wants is a vote upon his amendment, and it can not make any difference to him, it seems to me, whether it comes now as in Committee of the Whole or later in the Senate; but, in order to effectually prevent any imputation of bad faith against me, I want to state that if the bill should go into the Senate this afternoon and the Senator from Missouri should press his amendment, I would then adopt whatever measures I could to prevent action upon it this afternoon in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that is the reason I made the suggestion a moment ago. If the vote be taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, and if it should fail as in Committee of the Whole, the exigency would not exist which the Senator from Connecticut contemplates, and we would probably be able to finish the bill. I think that is the better course, even to accomplish the object which the Senator from Connecticut has in mind. Let us take a vote now, and if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri should prevail, then the Senator from Connecticut could have recourse in the Senate to such methods as commend themselves to his judgment. If, on the other hand, the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri should fail, the Senator from Connecticut would have no disposition to protract or delay the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What the Senator says is undoubtedly true and filled with wisdom, but it is all preceded with a little "if." If the Senator from Missouri will guarantee me that his amendment will fail, I will guarantee that I shall have no objection to its being voted upon.

Mr. GORE. The Senator loses no right, because when the bill is reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole it will be open to such methods as the Senator may care to adopt.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I would lose no right; but I assume that the Senators who will vote upon the amendment as in Committee of the Whole, if it should be allowed to come to a vote within a few moments, would be the same Senators who would be here when the fiction is gone through with by which the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

Mr. GORE. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And if the same Senators should vote upon the roll call within 10 minutes on the same proposition, I would not apprehend, unless they are more vacillating than I think they are, that there would be any different result on the vote.

Mr. GORE. The Senator could have recourse to his filibuster in the Senate——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have stated that I was aware of that; but I——

Mr. GORE. And could probably put the bill over until Monday, when the absentees may see fit to grace the Senate with their presence.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. REED. I do not want to delay the passage of this bill to-day, if it can be passed to-day. I would rather let it go through with an appropriation of this character than to see it held up indefinitely, and I am willing that the vote on the amendment which I have submitted shall be postponed until we are ready to go from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate. I want, however, to reserve the right then to renew the matter, if I see fit to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well, Mr. President, if the Senator withholds his amendment, the Senator from Oklahoma can proceed with the rest of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri withholds his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I gave notice that after the committee amendments had been voted upon I would ask to recur to page 7, and offer certain amendments to the first paragraph on that page. The Senate disagreed to the amendment to that paragraph offered by the committee, and I gave notice that I would move, first, to strike out the proviso as amended, and also would move to strike out "$26,000" and insert "$17,500." I now move that the proviso beginning on page 7, line 4, down to and including the word "bureau," in line 8, on the same page, be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall offer no resistance to that amendment relating to the proviso.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I gave notice that I would move to strike out "$26,000" in line 3, on page 7, and insert "$17,500," but since then I have received a letter from Mr. Marvin, the Chief of the Weather Bureau, in which he asks me to allow the amount to be "$20,000" instead of "$17,500," and he gives good reasons for the request. I shall therefore move that "$26,000" be stricken out and that "$20,000" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. GORE. I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The motion was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, on page 42, line 20, I move to strike out "$15,000" and to substitute therefor "$20,000," and, in line 23, to strike out "Western" and substitute therefor "United," making it read "United States" instead of "Western States."

This will not change the amount of the general appropriation, but will merely make the amount to be applied for the purposes indicated in the proviso $20,000; and instead of applying it to the Western States alone it will be applied to all the States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. On what page is that?

Mr. WEST. On page 42.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has announced to-day that unless the committee amendment proposed to be amended by the Senator from Georgia be reconsidered, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia is not in order.

Mr. WEST. I thought the bill had reached the Senate, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. WEST. I beg pardon of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall only occupy the time of the Senate for a moment. As a member of the committee which has had this bill under consideration, I wish to offer an amendment to strike out, on page 11, line 22, the word "southern," before the word "cattle," so that the language will read:

> For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I can see a reason for putting into this bill language that will protect the South or the North or the West from something that is common only to that particular section, but this is a matter which applies to the whole country, to the entire United States. There is no reason why this disease in sheep and cattle should not be eradicated wherever it may be found, and for that reason I offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 22, before the word "cattle," it is proposed to strike out "southern," so that it will read, "inspection of cattle," and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota is at all necessary. The language just preceding that is sufficient to cover the work which he has in mind. The Senator, of course, is aware that the southern cattle communicate a certain disease—Texas fever—which other cattle do not communicate; that is, this disease and tick originate in the South, and the transportation of these cattle to other sections of the country communicates the disease; but this relates to the particular cattle which are freighted with this particular disease.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that we frequently have this disease among cattle and sheep in the Western States. We have had it in North Dakota; I know they have had it in Montana, and I presume it has prevailed in other Western States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I presume it is the disease communicated by the southern cattle, is it not?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. president, I have sufficient confidence in the Secretary of Agriculture to believe that he will use this money wherever it is necessary to use it; but I can see no good reason why we should tie his hands, and say to him that if this disease is found among cattle in other sections of the country he shall not be permitted to use any portion of this appropriation to eradicate it. That is certainly a limitation upon——

Mr. GORE. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that. The reference to southern cattle is to the inspection of southern cattle to prevent their communicating this disease. The northern cattle do not communicate the disease. The southern cattle do. This relates, not to the study and eradication of the disease itself, but to the inspection of southern cattle which are being shipped from the South to the North, in order to prevent the communication of this disease to North Dakota cattle.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from North Dakota is not mistaken. The Senator from Oklahoma is mistaken. I will read the language again for the information of the Senator:

For inspection and quarantine work—

I have seen the time in North Dakota when we had to quarantine our cattle and our sheep because they were infected with scab.

Mr. GORE. There is nothing in this bill to prohibit that.

Mr. GRONNA. But I want the language broad enough so that if it is ascertained that the scab is among the cattle and the sheep of North Dakota, the Secretary of Agriculture will be permitted to use some of this money which we are appropriating.

Mr. GORE. The bill provides for that.

Mr. GRONNA. I beg to differ with the Senator; the bill does not provide for it.

Mr. GORE. The language the Senator has read provides for it.

Mr. GRONNA. If the bill provided as it does on page 12, commencing with line 8, "For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks," it would be different. That is a special disease; but this language simply places a limitation upon the law and prohibits the Secretary of Agriculture from using any of this money if scab is found on cattle or sheep in any other section except the South. There can be no justification for it; and I, for one, will not submit to a proposition of this kind, which is eminently unfair.

I have not criticized this bill because larger appropriations have been made to eradicate diseases and insects and pests which, because of climatic conditions, are found in certain sections of our country, nor am I going to do so now; but I do insist upon a square deal, and I am sure every Senator here will admit that what I propose in this amendment is only fair.

I do not raise this question in order to delay the passage of the bill. I fully realize, as much as anyone, being a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that the chairman has been very patient, and that the passage of the bill has been delayed for a long time. For that reason I do not want to take up time unnecessarily. When, however, I find rank discriminations of this kind in the bill, I can not do otherwise than call attention to them in as brief a manner as possible.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think there is a good deal of merit in the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, and I submit in all fairness that the qualifying adjective ought not to be there at all.

It is true that the southern cattle are more generally infected than ours in the North, and it is equally true that our northern cattle usually get the infection from southern cattle. I appreciate that the greater portion of the work ought to be done among the southern cattle, and in all reasonable probability the greater amount of the appropriation ought to be expended in that locality. When, however, the cattle in the northern section of the country do chance to be thus infected, as unfortunately occurs, I can see no reason at all why, when we ask for some effort on the part of the Agricultural Department for the extermination of the disease, we should be told, "We have no appropriation that is available for use in your section of the country." Now, although the infection may be given by southern cattle, it may very rapidly extend to the native cattle and affect them likewise.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think he will find that this disease is incident to the tick that is indigenous to the South, and it does not spread. It is only the animal itself that is inoculated with the tick that comes from the southern cattle. The tick does not propagate in your section. That is my understanding.

Mr. WARREN. Unfortunately we have had some very distressing and some very disastrous and some very expensive experience in that line.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That may be true on account of a herd of southern cattle coming in and the tick spreading to individual cattle; but after that one inoculation the tick does not propagate and go further in your section. I think the object of this wording was to restrict it to the home of the insect that causes the trouble. That was the reason why the word "southern" was placed here, because it is peculiar to that section.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that this provision does not apply to the tick. It has reference to scab, which often prevails among the cattle of the West.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think that is what this was intended to be.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from North Dakota is mistaken about that. There is no limitation upon the cattle or the sheep that are to be treated for that disease or infection. Among the enumerated objects the prevention of this disease among sheep and cattle everywhere is included. Following that is another clause directing the inspection of southern cattle—southern cattle that are to be shipped into Montana or into North Dakota—for the protection of the native cattle in those States.

I think the Senators from North Dakota and Montana would find nothing more disquieting to the cattle people of their sections and to the stockyards than the striking out of this word. It might be construed by them as an intention to open the gates and to let southern cattle go into their regions uninspected—a thing that certainly would be most calamitous. It is the second clause among a number of enumerated objects, and certainly is not liable to the construction placed on it by the Senator from North Dakota; otherwise I should very readily assent to his amendment.

This provides for an object which the Senator from North Dakota, above all others, ought to insist upon. It is protecting them against this plague, which does not occur north of the tick line excepting as it is communicated by southern cattle.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the States of Montana and Wyoming perhaps have received more southern cattle than most of the States, and they are perfectly familiar with the dangers of the tick and of the southern cattle. I should be the last one to want to tear down any precautions that are taken; but I think the language of this paragraph—and I did not notice it when we went over the bill—is ambiguous, and I am moved to ask the chairman to accept the amendment and let it go to conference for that reason.

This paragraph reads:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scables in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and the alteration of buildings thereon.

It goes on in that way; and the inspection should be, of course, as to all these items in all the States. Then follows the appropriation, which is $625,520; and then follows another paragraph, which says:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $400,000.

And it goes on from that. I think we will be perfectly safe in allowing the word to go out, anyhow, and having the bill go to conference in that way.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, before the Senator from Wyoming concludes I wish to say that I think the Senator from Oklahoma is correct in his contention. The Bureau of Animal Industry, I believe, or, at any rate, some department of the Government, has divided the United States into certain districts and applied quarantine lines and quarantine laws to certain portions of the United States. Cattle coming from below a certain quarantine line are presumed to be infected with southern fever caused by a tick, and under the present law and custom they are subject to inspection. They must be inspected before they are allowed to cross the quarantine line.

It is those southern cattle, cattle infected with the southern fever coming from below the quarantine line, that this particular clause is intended to affect. If you should make it general, you would provide for unnecessary inspection and holding up of cattle, possibly coming from uninfected districts.

The object of the provision is just as the chairman of the committee states, as I think. From my personal practical knowledge of the cattle business I think this provision is drawn expressly to serve the regions for which the appropriation in that respect is asked.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator would not want to ignore inspection for scab in cattle?

Mr. FALL. Oh, no; not at all. There is no necessity for striking out the word "southern," however, in this particular clause. They are all separate purposes. The first is the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle.

Mr. WARREN. It does not say "in Southern States" or "in Northern States."

Mr. FALL. Certainly not. That is general.

Mr. WARREN. They are liable to have it anywhere.

Mr. FALL. Second, the inspection of southern cattle. That is for the southern fever or splenetic fever, caused by the cattle tick, which is only a native or an inhabitant of a certain region inclosed in the quarantined district.

Mr. WARREN. But the language does not say that, until you get to the next section.

Mr. FALL. But this is under a general law. This is simply an appropriation for carrying out the general law, and the appropriation is properly worded for that particular purpose.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say, except that I see no reason why the word should be in there, and I see no harm that would be done if it should come out.

Mr. FALL. Those of us who live outside the quarantined district do not want our cattle stopped and inspected by United States inspectors unnecessarily in transit. Those of us who do ship cattle from south of the quarantine lines within the quarantined district, of course, must expect them to be subject to this particular inspection.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico will realize that we have had our cattle quarantined. We ship cattle from North Dakota. We ship cattle and sheep from the Western States.

Mr. FALL. And they are not inspected except for certain diseases. They are not quarantined except for certain purposes. They are inspected for scab, and you are compelled to dip them if they are found scabby; but your cattle are never inspected for splenetic or southern fever, and that is the reason they designate the southern cattle which come from within the quarantine lines.

Mr. WARREN. Why not say "for splenetic fever"?

Mr. FALL. I have no objection to saying it; but this is an appropriation to carry out a law now on the statute books.

Mr. GRONNA. Why should we not say that only southern cattle should be inspected?

Mr. FALL. Because only southern cattle are subject to splenetic fever, which is caused by the tick, except where other cattle may be temporarily infected. It is not a contagious disease. It is only infectious.

Mr. GRONNA. The language to which I object has reference to scab, which infects our western cattle and our western sheep.

Mr. FALL. That is made general. That is one species of disease.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. FALL. That is made general, because the disease is general all over the United States, not only within the quarantined district but without the quarantined district.

Mr. GRONNA. And if this provision becomes law the Secretary of Agriculture can not, unless he violates the law, inspect or quarantine cattle in the West that are affected with scab.

Mr. FALL. I do not agree with the Senator. If I did, I should certainly agree with his proposition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the word "southern" is a limitation upon the use to which this appropriation can be put. It seems to me we ought not to curb the power of the department with relation to expending this money wherever they deem it most needed. If that word is stricken out they will have the same discretion which they would have if the need existed only in the case of the southern cattle. The advantage of striking it out is that if there is an emergency in the western or the northern cattle it can be utilized for that purpose.

On that account, it seems to me, the word "southern" should be stricken out, leaving to the department the power to spend this money wherever they deem it most needed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am inclined to agree with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] about the use of the word "southern," but I wish to call attention to the fact that it seems to me much more than that word could be omitted from the bill.

The paragraph, beginning at line 20, reads:

For inspection and quarantine work—

And then goes on—including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock, and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals.

Every one of those things obviously would be included under the term "for inspection and quarantine work." It is all surplusage; and instead of extending the field over which the appropriation might be applied at the discretion of the department, if it does anything it restricts it and limits it.

I would suggest that if, beginning on line 20, after the word "work," all down to and including the word "animals" in line 25, should be stricken out, the bill would be equally efficient.

Mr. SHAFFROTH. I should like to say further that this provision carries the sum of $625,520, and right below it is an appropriation of $400,000. It seems to me the word "southern" is properly used there, because it applies to a certain disease to which a certain remedy should be applied. That being the case, it seems to me that the general power to use this money where the Government deems it most necessary should be the prevailing provision of the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the $400,000 provision is for the extermination of the fever tick, and remarkable progress has been made by the Government along that line. The quarantine line is constantly being pressed farther south. It now runs through the lower part of my State, and the department hopes in course of time to eradicate the tick from the entire country. That is local, the extirpation of the tick in its natural habitat. The other provision is to prevent communication of this disease by southern cattle to northern cattle.

If Senators desire to insert an express provision that northern cattle shall be inspected for southern ticks, I am content. It is an imaginary trouble, but if it will quiet their fears I shall interpose no objection. I certainly fear, however, that it would be disquieting to all the cattlemen throughout the Northwest to omit the word "southern" in this connection. It might lead some of them to fear that this inspection work is to be discontinued.

This is fixed work. It has relation to things that are actually being done in this department. It is not just dumped in here helter-skelter; and I have no doubt that omitting the word "southern" would excite a great deal of apprehension on the part of the cattlemen that this work would be discontinued in the future.

I do not feel the same apprehension over the use of the word "southern" or the use of the word "western" in this bill that some Senators seem to feel. I have a trust in the department that is equal to that expressed by the Senator from North Dakota. If he wishes to insert here a provision that northern cattle shall be inspected for southern ticks, or for anything else, I shall not object to it. I do object, however, to striking out the word "southern" and removing from northern cattle raisers the assurance that their cattle will be safeguarded against the importation of southern cattle that have not been inspected. We ought not to subject them to that apprehension.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Might not the language "inspection of cattle" include tuberculosis, for instance?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, all that work is provided for in this bill. This is a particular kind of inspection, relating to a particular kind of cattle, from a particular section, for a particular purpose. On line 3, on the next page, I think the Senator will observe a provision made for tuberculosis in cattle.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. If this is left as the Senator from North Dakota proposes by eliminating the word "southern," if this relates to a southern disease, of course that is where the work would be done, I apprehend. If the Senator's interpretation is correct, that this relates only to one particular disease, and that it is peculiar to southern cattle, there is a great deal of force in the argument; but if this disease is communicated by southern cattle to cattle in other sections, naturally they ought to be looked after, I suppose.

Mr. GORE. Perhaps the Senator is not familiar with the method of communication?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I will say that I am not.

Mr. GORE. The disease is communicated only by the tick, and the tick will not survive in the northern region except for a few days, a short time.

Mr. GALLINGER. But suppose cattle are purchased in Texas and transported to North Dakota or Montana and this troublesome insect is on the cattle at the time. Might it not then be communicated to the northern cattle?

Mr. GORE. That is what I want to prevent, in the first place. I want to restrict these cattle and prevent them from being taken into the North in the first instance; but I will say to the Senator that northern cattle die of the disease, while southern cattle do not. They are immune.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say, first, that I do not pretend to possess much information on this matter, and I have no disposition to say another word. It simply occurred to me that in that way the disease might be communicated from the South to the West, and hence the disease might exist in a Western State, or in a Northern State, for that matter.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the sole cause of splenetic fever, southern fever, how it can be communicated, and so forth, has not only been the subject of study by the department but it has been the subject of a very learned decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. The object of the wording of the appropriation is just as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has undertaken to state here.

Here is a general appropriation made for certain purposes. One of those purposes is the eradication of scab, as we call it in the West, in sheep and cattle. Another is the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels. Another is the execution of the 28-hour law. Another is the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and the alteration of buildings thereon. Another is the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals. The total appropriation is $625,520. One of the other purposes for which such portion of this money as is necessary is to be used is the inspection of southern cattle.

In the next portion of the paragraph an appropriation is made for the eradication of the splenetic fever, or the disease which is communicated only to other cattle by these southern cattle by the dropping of ticks from the southern cattle carrying those ticks, the ticks living upon the ground or upon the grass, and from the ground or from the grass finally crawling upon other cattle, northern cattle.

Just as the Senator from Oklahoma says, those ticks do not live for any length of time in any portion of the United States except those portions designated by the Bureau of Animal Industry as within certain quarantined districts. The United States and foreign countries are divided by this country into quarantined districts. In the northern portion, for instance, of Chihuahua—in fact, the entire State of Chihuahua north of Torreon—the cattle come into this country without inspection. Cattle from just south of that line coming into this country are inspected for southern fever.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to add that there is a large section of Texas that is also outside of the quarantine line.

Mr. FALL. Certainly; in fact, practically all northern Texas and panhandle Texas is outside of the quarantined district, and cattle shipped from that portion of Texas are not subject to inspection for southern fever.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to add, further, that we are rapidly cleaning up the State and are gradually narrowing the section that is under quarantine.

Mr. FALL. That is entirely correct.

One of the purposes for which this general appropriation is made is to enable inspection to be had of these southern cattle at the quarantine line. That is all there is to this item. There is no earthly necessity for striking out this word. The cattle are inspected before they get to Montana. They are inspected at the quarantined district when they cross the line, and that is the purpose of all this inspection. There is nothing sectional in it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if it is not true that if we should strike out the word "southern" here it might possibly extend this quarantine, in case they wished to do so for any purpose, to points where it does not already exist?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In other words, could they not make the very southern inspection of which the Senator speaks apply to North Dakota?

Mr. FALL. Why, of course they could.

It is for that reason, speaking as the representative of a constituency very largely engaged in the cattle business, that I oppose striking out the word "southern." If, however, it is to be stricken out, I do not want anything put in its place. The inspection of cattle means nothing further than is conveyed by the other portions of the bill. Either strike out that entire provision, all those words about the inspection of southern cattle, or else leave the word "southern" there.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Can the Senator give any reason why cattle or sheep in the North infected by this parasite called "scab" should not be inspected?

Mr. FALL. The Senator entirely misunderstands the purpose of this paragraph.

Mr. GRONNA. I am talking about the disease called "scab" which is caused by a parasite. It does not prevail as much in the North as in the South, but it does prevail in the North.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow his amendment to be read and then we will see what he is talking about?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 22, strike out the word "southern," before "cattle."

Mr. FALL. That does not apply to scab in sheep or in cattle.

Mr. GRONNA. It applies to inspection.

Mr. FALL. The Senator's amendment does not reach what he is talking about.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and subject to amendment. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not see the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and he had an understanding with the chairman of the committee, I understood.

Mr. BRANDEGEE entered the Chamber.

Mr. BRISTOW. I see the Senator is here now. I desire to say to him that the bill is just ready to go into the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was going to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He withdrew the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood he withdrew it for the purpose of reoffering it when the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. REED entered the Chamber.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Missouri is on the floor and can speak for himself.

Mr. WEST. I understood he gave notice that he would offer it when the bill was in the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Missouri knows what he said. I do not remember myself. The Senator himself is here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment, if the Senator from Missouri desires now to present his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to two things. It will take me but a moment.

I have here a newspaper clipping which states the fact with reference to the case brought in Arkansas involving the validity of the law. The article states:

> The constitutionality of this act for the protection of migratory birds (3 Stat., 847) approved March 4, 1913, and the regulations thereunder, which were approved by proclamation of President Wilson October 1, 1913, came on for hearing last Tuesday before Judge Jacob Trieber, of the United States district court, at Jonesboro, Ark.
> The case was United States v. Harvey C. Shauver, who had been arrested by two of Col. Acklen's Arkansas deputies for violating the Federal migratory bird law.
> E. L. Westbrook appeared for the defendant and Col. J. H. Acklen for the Government.
> A demurrer to the indictment raised the point that the act violated the tenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, which provides that: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."
> The demurrer made the further point that nothing could be found in the Constitution that warranted Congress in passing legislation for the protection of migratory birds; that game birds when within a State are the property of the State, and are held by the State not as a proprietor but as trustee, for the use and benefit of all its citizens in common; that there existed no national police power on the part of the Government to regulate the killing of game within a State, which police power to so regulate was vested exclusively in the State under its constitutionally reserved rights.

Col. Acklen, for the Government, insisted that the United States has a qualified property right in all migratory birds—that come within its boundaries; that rules and regulations as to killing could be enacted under subsection 2 of section 3 of article 4, which provides that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needed rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular States"; that such qualified property rights as the Government had in migratory birds warranted Congress in passing legislation regulating the killing of same; and, further, that the United States, in the exercise of the national police power, which has been invoked in many instances for the general welfare and sustained by the courts, could constitutionally pass and enforce an act for the proper protection of migratory birds.

I heard something like that on the floor of the Senate—

The case is a very important one, as it raises for the first time since the passage of the act the constitutional questions above set out, and its decision by Judge Trieber will be awaited with much interest by sportsmen and bird lovers throughout the country. The case will go to the United States Supreme Court for final decision.

Mr. President, I have been furnished with a copy of a telegram to-day received from Mr. Visart, the representative of the Agricultural Department, who is pushing this case. The telegram is to Mr. T. S. Palmer, assistant chief in charge of game preservation of the biological survey of the Agricultural Department, and reads as follows:

MAY 23, 1914.

Judge Trieber held migratory-bird law unconstitutional; Shauver case. Will forward copy of decision as soon as obtainable.

E. V. VISART,
Representative of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. President, so confident am I, in view of this decision which fortifies the opinion, I think, held by nearly every lawyer in the country, that this act is absolutely unconstitutional that I do not want to delay the passage of the bill by forcing the amendment. If we could vote upon it at this time I would insist upon a vote, but the Senator from Connecticut, I understand, is taking the position that, in view of the absence of a certain Member, he would have to insist upon such a course of procedure as would prevent the passage of the bill to-night. In view of the fact that the law has been declared unconstitutional, I feel sure the Department of Agriculture will not waste any more money except to pursue this particular case to the end. So, in view of the statement of the Senator from Connecticut that he will have to insist upon delaying the passage of the bill, I will not insist upon the amendment being voted upon unless I could get a vote now, which I understand the Senator declines to give. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has stated my position correctly, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. I reserve the right to offer amendments to the bill on pages 19 and 70.

Mr. WEST. I have already given notice that I would offer an amendment in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia desires to reserve the amendment on page 42.

Mr. WEST. And on page 20. I gave notice of it the other day. I do not think the Vice President was in the chair at that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments to which the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Georgia refer being reserved, the question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. WEST. I propose to amend, on page 42, line 20, by striking out "$15,000" and substituting therefor "$20,000," and in line 23 to strike out "Western" and substituting therefor "United."

Mr. GALLINGER. So that if amended it will read——

Mr. WEST. Had I better read it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read at the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 20, strike out "$15,000" and insert "$20,000"; in line 23 strike out "Western" and insert the word "United," so as to read:

Trees grown in the United States.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if he is satisfied this $5,000 additional will take care of the additional work contemplated by changing the word "Western" to "United"?

Mr. WEST. I am not satisfied. Really I do not know anything about what may be the cost except to make it broader. I just decided that I would move to include $5,000 more to be used in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture for this purpose.

Mr. JONES. Has not the Senator any information from the department as to the additional cost?

Mr. WEST. I have not.

Mr. JONES. I do not like to oppose the Senator's amendment, yet I would not like to see a proposition go in that might divert most of this money from the purpose to which the committee intended the $15,000 to be used.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will observe that the general appropriation has been increased $25,000. That is the amount allowed in the bill by the Senate. We have $25,000 by an amendment made in the Senate.

Mr. JONES. No; $15,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; $15,000 is the amount that is diverted.

Mr. JONES. That is diverted for the purpose specified in the proviso, of course. I would not want the proviso changed in that way so that the $15,000 might be diverted to something else, because the work provided for in the proviso is a very important one.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator from Georgia to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$20,000." That probably would be sufficient.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WEST. I have proposed to make it $20,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator can change that amount.

Mr. JONES. Make it $20,000.

Mr. WEST. I really do not know the amount that is necessary, but I thought the Senator from Washington was objecting to it because the $5,000 was to come out of the general appropriation of $67,400.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. WEST. As far as I am concerned, I first proposed to make it $25,000, but at the instance of others I cut it down to $20,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia, as a member of the committee, I am quite sure that the chairman of the committee will bear me out in the statement that $15,000 is required to do the work in this particular locality. Of course I have no objection to doing the same kind of work in other parts of the United States, but if the department is to do the work, we must increase the appropriation. I simply make that suggestion.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, this paragraph in the bill was very carefully considered both by the committee and by the department. The University of Idaho has for a number of years been making experiments for the purpose of utilizing the by-products of stumps and timber from logged-off land. I took the matter up with the committee and introduced this amendment. I discussed the matter with the chairman, and he suggested that I take it up with the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. I did, and he approved the amendment.

The saving of by-products from the stumps and timber from logged-off lands is a matter of great importance and deserves our serious consideration.

I wish to present to the Senate six good reasons why this amendment should be adopted:

First. There is urgent need for research looking to better methods of utilizing our wood resources. The forestry department of the University of Idaho has shown by much valuable work already accomplished that its faculty appreciates the importance of the work, and has, in spite of limited funds, been untiring in its efforts both to solve the problems and to awaken interest in closer and better utilization of our vast wood resources.

Second. The above-named department has made further progress along the lines of these investigations than any other institution and is well equipped both with experts and experience for the work it is doing and proposes to continue. This fact is recognized by the Bureau of Chemistry at Washington to the extent that it has detailed one of its most competent experts to go to Moscow and assist in the various problems on which the forestry department is now engaged.

Third. The department of forestry is at present receiving no funds from the Department of Agriculture, and is supported wholly by a special appropriation from the State of Idaho; yet it is engaged on problems of immense importance to the agricultural interests of the entire country.

Fourth. The Department of Agriculture, through its Bureau of Chemistry, at Washington, D. C., has now a plan of cooperation with the department of forestry at the University of Idaho whereby it will be possible to go more thoroughly into the above-named subjects than ever before, but funds for this work are absolutely necessary.

Fifth. The problems proposed to be solved are not merely of a local nature, but in their solution will affect millions of acres of logged-off land now unproductive, in every part of our country.

Sixth. This work is now thoroughly established at the University of Idaho, and can be more quickly and cheaply carried to completion there than at any other place.

The University of Idaho is better prepared than any other institution for this work; the department made the estimate of $15,000, with the thought that it might be necessary to do some work in other Western States. The States of Oregon and of Washington are in hearty sympathy with this work, and are willing to cooperate with us. The department suggested that we do not name the University of Idaho, but name the entire Western States, as the experiments carried on by the university would doubtless extend over other States, and that it would make no difference what the wording was the funds would be used for the purposes intended in the amendment, and for that reason, instead of saying "University of Idaho," use the term "Western States." That is why those words were put in.

I really believe that this work can be carried on better there than in any other part of the United States, because they are well prepared and equipped to do it. I realize that there are great lumber interests in the South, but Idaho has 17,000,000 acres of timber in her forest reserves. The gross receipts to the Government last year from that source were something over $246,447. It seems only fair that with 17,000,000 acres of our timber tied up in forest reserves, with annual gross receipts of the large amount of over $246,000, that Idaho and the other Western States are entitled to receive some encouragement in the work that these States are doing. Prof. Shattuck, one of the best posted men in the United States to-day on this subject, has worked earnestly and faithfully, and has the confidence of the Agriculture Department. Mr. Shattuck does not do all this work in a laboratory, but goes right out in the field, and shows the farmer how to burn a stump.

In writing me recently, Prof. Shattuck said:

The experiments which the department of forestry at the University of Idaho is now carrying on are yielding some rather surprising results in the way of crude distillate derived from the destruction of stumps by means of our hood and air condenser. The man who has charge of the stump-burning operations in the field sends me the following report on a stump which, by the way, was 4 feet 5 inches in diameter and 3 feet 4 inches in height:

"I am sending by to-day's freight 110 gallons of crude distillate. This is one-half of the liquid that came from the stump. The stump produced 200 gallons of thin liquid and 20 gallons of heavy tar. There was a large tap root to the stump, and the fire followed it down fully 6 feet. The apparatus did not need one bit of attention while in operation, and it certainly did its work completely."

This demonstrates conclusively that they are securing results and that this method of saving by-products is practical and should be encouraged. Again, under date of April 17, in his letter to me, Prof. Shattuck says:

I wish to state that the plan of cooperation between the Bureau of Chemistry and the Department of Forestry at the university is leading to some highly surprising and satisfactory results. We are running our retort day and night, and at the same time carrying on the work of refining up to the limit of the capacity of the men on the job to stand the work, and the results are entirely satisfactory; and what is more, we are making it of stumps and clearing the land as we go. The average of 15 charges of the retort thus far run will furnish a gross output each of more than $30 value per cord of this stump wood. The products obtained are turpentine, pine oil, rosin oil, creosote, pitch, and the various acid liquors and dyes. The expense of securing and carrying this material through the retort can not be at the outside more than $15, and often it will be nearer $10, so it is easy to figure on reasonable dividends for the industry when it is launched on a commercial scale.

They are really doing this work there. These men have had the experience. The matter was taken up and samples of the by-products were presented to the Committee on Agriculture. There was not a single dissenting vote in the committee on this appropriation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRADY. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I do not understand that anyone is opposing the proposition embodied in the bill, but I want to ask the Senator whether or not he thinks it would be unwise to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST]?

Mr. BRADY. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment if it is made as a whole.

Mr. JONES. Making the appropriation $20,000, as he suggests?

Mr. WEST. That is the amendment I have offered.

Mr. BRADY. But I do not want the $20,000 amendment to go into the bill and have the Western States not named. If the Senator will make his amendment as a whole, including $25,000, I will gladly accept it. The Senator proposes to insert "United States" for "Western States." I am entirely confident that the department would use this $15,000 for the purpose for which it was intended.

I realize that these experiments should be carried on for the benefit of the entire country. Fifteen thousand dollars is all that our university will need, and we have no objection at all to $10,000 being used in other sections. If the Senator from Georgia will move his amendment as a whole as one amendment, I will be glad to accept it.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "$15,000" and to insert "$25,000," and in line 23 to strike out the word "Western" before the word "States" and to insert the word "United."

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I desire to say in connection with this matter that it has suggested itself to me in reading the bill that so far as the business of the utilization of roots and stumps from cut-over land has gone it has been expensive in southern territory. The people there have spent, I reckon, over half a million dollars in order to bring about results and take care of these by-products of the sawmill and the use of stumps and roots which have been obtained from the field, and I thought, inasmuch as that section of the country furnishes as much lumber as nearly all the balance of the United States, some attention ought to be given by the Government to the encouragement of the making use of these by-products from the mill and from the roots and the stumps as they are gathered from the fields.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me right there, I imagine that all any of us, whether we be from the South or from the West, want in regard to this matter is a demonstration of what can be done. As is suggested by a Senator, all that is necessary is to ascertain the facts; and when they are ascertained they are just as valuable to the South as to the West. In order to bring out these facts and to demonstrate what can be done along this line it seems to me all that is necessary is simply to make an appropriation for the purpose; and then, whatever information is derived that will be of real benefit will be accessible to all sections alike. When the facts are ascertained by experimentation on cut-over land in the West, the same treatment that will prove efficacious in the western country where they are now carrying on the work will be equally efficacious in the South, and you do not need to establish a chemical plant to accomplish a purpose that they are already accomplishing.

Mr. WEST. I note what the Senator from Arizona says in reference to the matter, but the conditions are somewhat different in the southern part of the United States; and I do think that, inasmuch as there has been already so much money expended in the Southern States in order to make use of the by-products from the sawmills and the roots and the stumps from the fields in cut-over lands, some university in that section—with me it matters not what university—should have a portion of this money in order to expend it in that direction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have had two thoughts about this matter. One was that I wanted to make this national so that we shall not be voting a subsidy—I want to relieve my Democratic friends from that implication; the other is that there is no more reason why the forests of the South and the forests of New England should not have an opportunity to have this experiment made upon their trees than the forests of the West, though the trees are somewhat different. That was what led me, in the first place, to suggest that this appropriation ought not to be confined to the Western States. I trust that the amendments which have been proposed will be agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, this is to teach somebody how to pull stumps and the what to do with them after they are pulled, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, partly that and partly this, too: It gives the western owner of lands an opportunity to have his stumps pulled at the expense of the Government.

Mr. BRISTOW. I thought so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have once or twice suggested that I should like to have the Government tackle the rocks in some of the fields of New Hampshire and pull them up. They can pull them up with exactly the same machinery with which they pull stumps out; but I have not found anybody who seemed to agree with me that that work ought to be entered into.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, it is an interesting experiment for somebody who is under Government pay to have a job and to go down there and help pull stumps. If they did it for the farmers or landowners they would not get more than $20 or $25 a month, while they would probably get a hundred dollars a month when the Government employs them to do the work.

Out in Indiana, when my friend the junior Senator from that State [Mr. KERN] was a boy, there were a great many stumps, and I remember that when I was a boy in Kentucky the fields were full of stumps, but I never heard of any of the farmers or the landowners or lumbermen there asking the Federal Government to come and help them pull stumps and tell them what to do with the stumps after they were pulled. It may be that we have reached that period in our agricultural development where the pulling of stumps becomes a great national problem, like the killing of prairie dogs and a few other things, but I suppose that $25,000——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will yield the floor in a moment. I suppose that $25,000 to develop the stump-pulling business in the country will furnish very valuable information which the American people need.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from Kansas would be very eloquent and impressive if it had any relation whatever to the subject. The Senator from Kansas and the Senator from New Hampshire I think entirely misapprehend the purpose of this appropriation. It comes under the Bureau of Chemistry. It contemplates chemical tests with relation to stumps and other waste timber to see if by-products can not be developed and thereby prevent enormous waste. Those Senators are aware that, according to the conservationists, the estimate now is that 50 per cent of a tree in the forest is waste; that only 50 per cent of it ever goes into the service of man. This is to make an humble effort to see if some use can not be made of the waste. The work contemplated is chemical in its character and has no relation whatever to the extraction of stumps from the land. I feel sure that with that statement possibly those Senators will modify their views.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question? In Oklahoma and Kansas there is a great deal of straw that goes to waste. Traveling along in the springtime over those great States one can see for miles and miles the smoke from straw stacks that are burning; also in that State sunflowers grow to an enormous height, and there is a great deal of waste in connection with sunflowers; they grow and die and pass away. Why would it not be well to have the Federal Government experiment and tell us what we can do with our sunflowers and our surplus straw?

Mr. GORE. The Federal Government has experimented; Congress has made an appropriation to experiment with straw and similar waste products to see if paper can not be produced from the straw and sunflowers which are going to waste.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire how long that experiment has been in process?

Mr. GORE. I do not think it is in process now. Some four years ago it was in process. An appropriation was made for that purpose, and not only that, but similar experiments were conducted in relation to cornstalks, and but for the expense of assembling the stalks paper could be made from them successfully and profitably; but the expense of assembling prevents the conversion from being a commercial success.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say to the Senator from Oklahoma, with his permission, that some 20 years ago I was printing a newspaper in a town in central Kansas, and there was at that time a straw-paper mill in that community. I printed a newspaper edition one day on paper made from straw that grew in the community; but the straw-paper combination came along and closed up our mill, so that we are shipping our paper now from somewhere in the East. I am more interested in legislation that would break up the combinations and trusts that destroy our industries when we start them in the various localities, than I am in putting a lot of theorists on the pay roll in order to enable them to experiment from year to year in some new theory they have, and always at the Federal expense.

Mr. GORE. I shall join the Senator from Kansas in warfare against the Straw Trust or any other trust affecting the people of Kansas or of Oklahoma or of any other State.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Kansas knows me well enough to understand that I would not have introduced this amendment if I had not believed it was worthy of the serious consideration of the Members of this body. Since I have been in the Senate I have, I think, listened rather more than I have talked, and I have gained valuable information. Included in the information I have gained is the fact that there is a great deal of work that can be done in committee, and that after one is here for a length of time he can present matters in such a manner as to meet the approval of the committee when one has a worthy cause, and that when such a matter comes into the Senate with the approval of a committee it gives it great weight.

This appropriation has the unanimous approval of the committee, and this should give added weight to the reasons I have stated why the amendment should be adopted.

My friend the senior Senator from Kansas talks about the wonderful work of pulling stumps. The department of forestry in the University of Idaho has demonstrated to the satisfaction of business men of the West that if this matter is properly handled average stump lands can be cleared without a dollar's cost to the farmer; and it does seem to me that we ought to be able to present to this deliberative body a small amendment looking to that end, and involving only $15,000, without having it subjected to ridicule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that the Government would clear land without a dollar's expense on the part of the farmer?

Mr. BRADY. I said that the farmer can do it himself by this method when it is properly developed. We are teaching the farmer so that he may learn how to do this without expense.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KERN. I want to inquire if the name of that gentleman is "Mulberry Sellers"?

Mr. BRADY. Does the Senator desire the name of the man in charge of the work?

Mr. KERN. I inquire if the name of the official who is so enthusiastic about that proposition is "Mulberry Sellers"?

Mr. GALLINGER. "There's millions in it."

Mr. KERN. I never heard of such a proposition, except from that distinguished individual who achieved some notoriety around the country some time ago.

I may add while on my feet that I have recently cleared some 15 or 20 acres of land down in Virginia on a place I own, and if I could find the name of the man who will make the stumps pay for the expense of taking them out I would like to form his acquaintance.

Mr. BRADY. Make this appropriation and I assure the Senator that we will have that information in a very reasonable length of time.

I was not convinced myself that such results could be obtained until one day I attended a luncheon held at the Commercial Club at Moscow, Idaho, and Prof. Shattuck presented his claims as to what he had accomplished, and called attention to his samples confirming his statements. I said at that time it was a revelation to me and I believed his work needed encouragement, and assured those present I would do my utmost to have a reasonable appropriation made for that purpose.

I have offered this amendment in good faith, believing that it will accomplish a good purpose, and I think that it should be adopted.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I want to say in reply to the remarks of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] that I know he would not offer an amendment except in good faith, believing that it would be for the best interests of the people and would serve the purposes of wise and beneficial legislation. I know that there is not a Senator in this body who is more desirous of serving well his constituents and the country than is the Senator from Idaho. As to the merits of this legislation, of course, he and I may have different opinions, but I would not want for anything to question his desire to serve well his constituents and the country.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I also desire to say that I have no thought of impugning the motives of the Senator from Idaho. I know he wants to do his duty, but I do want to say that his faith is simply sublime.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I want to say, in reply to the Senator from Idaho, that I did not have the privilege of going before the Committee on Agriculture when this bill was under consideration there, and consequently I could offer nothing in this connection for the southern part of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask if both amendments were included in that one vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; both were included in the one vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is all right, then.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I propose now, on page 20, beginning with line 25, to strike out the proviso, as amended. It is the third proviso on the page.

I am not criticizing anybody in discussing this matter; but it has been the custom in the past for wealthy men, men of great fortunes, to make a donation of part of what they have made——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I intend to raise a point of order. I think this amendment has already been concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no; it can be amended in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. All the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WEST. I gave notice several days ago that I should move to strike out this proviso when the bill came into the Senate, and then again to-day.

Mr. GORE. I did not understand that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Notice of a motion to strike out reserves no question. The question must be specifically reserved.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I distinctly heard the Senator from Georgia reserve the right to offer amendments on pages 42 and 20 at the time he gave his notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senator from Georgia is in order.

Mr. WEST. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] some days ago said that if we had $10,000,000 for the purpose we could leave from Tennessee to the Gulf a space 100 miles wide, and in the judgment of skilled experts it would stop the onward march of the boll weevil. If the facts that were presented in the Senate here were true, in reference to the States it has already ravaged, it would mean in the State of Georgia, even in one year, the saving of from sixty to seventy million dollars if we could only stop the march of the boll weevil.

I do not suppose Mr. Rockefeller or Mr. Carnegie or any of the very wealthy men of the country would give so much to that cause, but when they are willing to donate a certain amount from the money they have accumulated—it may be that they accumulated it through the suffering of somebody—I think they should be permitted to give it; and I for one, speaking for my State, would accept it for the education of the people and for the betterment and uplift of the agricultural conditions in that State.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WEST. I do.

Mr. GORE. The Senator understands that there is nothing in this proviso that would prevent the State of Georgia from accepting money for this or any other purpose.

Mr. WEST. I understand that, Mr. President. The State of Georgia could accept it for itself if it were tendered to the State of Georgia; but as a Senator here, I am willing to accept it for the United States.

Going back somewhat in the past—you may call this blood money and filthy money and all that sort of thing; but I would point to one Nobel, of Sweden, who gives out $200,000 every year; and how is that money taken from the people? In the very same way that Rockefeller extorted his money from the people. He not only invented explosives, nitroglycerin, guncotton, and patented dynamite, but he went down into the petroleum fields in Baku, in the southern part of Russia, on the Caspian Sea, and there made millions of dollars. Yet these great prizes are given out every year, five in number—one for medical science, one for chemistry, one for physical science or physiology, one for the best literary production, and one for the person who does the greatest thing for universal, international peace, whether by suppression of armies or the furtherance of peace congresses. These are the five persons who receive every year $40,000 each, for what? For the betterment of the condition of the human race.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator mean to charge the philanthropist of whom he is speaking with the same course of criminal conduct that has marked the career of John D. Rockefeller, as shown by the authenticated history of him and his times and his life?

Mr. WEST. That is what I said, Mr. President; that he obtained his money in the same way and grew immensely wealthy. That is the reason why he could give it for this purpose; and the people of the United States, when these great prizes have been tendered them, have not seen fit to reject them.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERN. What violations of the law does the Senator say were committed by the philanthropist he specifies? Did he violate any of the laws of his country?

Mr. WEST. Why, in the accumulation of wealth——

Mr. KERN. No; I am asking the specific question whether the Senator is prepared to charge that this philanthropist violated any of the laws of his country.

Mr. WEST. I am not saying whether he violated any laws or not. I have said here, and I say again, that he has invented explosives, guncotton, nitroglycerin, and patented dynamite, and these are great destroyers of human life, and that is more than taking property away from people. Then he went down in the oil fields of Baku, in Russia, and made millions of dollars that he has given by will to be distributed for these great causes—for the elevation of humanity.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WEST. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I am quite sure the Senator from Georgia does not wish to charge that Alfred Nobel has ever been accused of being a violator of law, or that he has accumulated any wealth by violating any law. When the Senator from Georgia reads his history I believe he will find that Alfred Nobel was always looked upon as a patriot. It is true that he made money from inventions and then from discoveries; but, Mr. President, nowhere will it be found that he ever made a dollar by extortion or by violating any law.

Mr. LANE and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WEST. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I trust the United States——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is whether the Senator from Georgia yields to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think I heard the Senator assent to my interrupting him.

Mr. WEST. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I hope the United States may be spared from living on the contributions of a Rockefeller or a Carnegie. It would be equivalent to a family living on the wages of sin.

Could the Senator have been with me this morning and heard the pitiful tale of three sad-faced, wan-faced women, fresh from the mines of Colorado, suffering the brutality and the vengeance of the Rockefeller millionaires, through their minions, he would not have had the face to stand here in this audience and press the receiving of a contribution from such a source.

If we can not exterminate the cotton boll weevil without recourse to Rockefeller and Carnegie, then a thousand times rather let it destroy the entire cotton crop, and God in His wisdom and humanity will provide another source for the clothing of mankind.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I did not think I was making a speech. It would take me a month to tell what I feel of the iniquities of this family of Rockefellers and the wealth accumulated by Carnegie.

Mr. LANE and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WEST. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I feel I will be justified in saying at this juncture that the General Education Board holds as a part of its securities $2,500,000 of stocks or bonds of the Colorado Industrial Co., which is the master company of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the very company which is now involved in a labor war with the miners in Colorado. I may also say that the General Education Board has a million or more of the stocks and bonds of the International Harvester Co., the Steel Trust, the Tobacco Trust, the Sugar Trust, and, I think, all the other industrial combinations which have been adjudged by the Supreme Court of this country to be violators of the law of the land.

Mr. LANE. Now, Mr. President, if I may be allowed I should like to ask the Senator—and I feel sure that he has not the information—whether he knew of the conditions which prevail or the circumstances which have lately occurred in Colorado, which is one of the sources from which this money is obtained, from the mines there?

Mr. WEST. No, sir; I know nothing of the details of the occurrences out in Colorado—not a thing.

Mr. LANE. Then I should like permission to state to the Senator that I have the information from those who seem to know that during the late strike there was a colony of miners——

Mr. WEST. Of course I regret as much as anybody that any man should work a hardship on another. "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn"; yet if the rich men of the United States see fit to part with a portion of what they have accumulated, I can not see any reason why it should not go to the upbuilding of this great country.

Mr. LANE. I should like to suggest to the Senator that in this instance the Government is going into partnership with the man who furnishes this kind of money.

Mr. WEST. I will ask, Does the Government go into partnership with such men when it extorts taxes from them? The Government takes money from them in order to run the Government.

Mr. LANE. It has a rather difficult time, I think, in extorting taxes from them.

Mr. WEST. I will not say "extort." I will take the word back. It receives taxes from them, if that expression suits the Senator better.

Mr. LANE. I will wait until the Senator gets through and then I will give him some instances.

Mr. WEST. I am not especially selecting Mr. Rockefeller or Mr. Carnegie or Mr. Flagler, who has passed from this vale of tears, or Mr. Plant. If there are two men in the State of Florida to whom the State could afford to build a monument, they are Henry M. Flagler and Mr. Plant. They have done more for the development of that State than any other men who have ever gone there.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They do not deserve any credit for that. They robbed it from the rest of the people somewhere else.

Mr. WEST. The State has received it, and if we have received something that has been beneficial to the State we ought to acknowledge it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In Georgia or Florida or some other State they may be glad of it, but in many other parts of this great country we are not glad of it.

Mr. WEST. I am aware of that, and I am not defending these rich men. Their great donations to these objects may appear to many, and they appear to me, as a philanthropic paradox; but they give it, and why not receive it for these objects? If they retain it, they will still have more with which to oppress you.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I ask, in all respect for the Senator's argument, would the Senator favor taking the money of a bank robber and devoting it to these uplift purposes?

Mr. WEST. I will ask the Senator a question in reply. Does not the Senator suppose that the church has received many donations from bank robbers and from blacklegs? In giving that to the church does that hurt the great cause of religion?

Mr. KENYON. If the church knew it came from a blackleg or a blackmailer or a bank robber, it would hurt the church.

Mr. WEST. Of course, if they knowingly went into partnership with a blackleg or a bank robber, no honest man would tolerate that.

Mr. KENYON. Here is one branch of Congress investigating the conditions in Colorado, where Mr. Rockefeller's interests are largely the disturbing factor and women and children are being murdered and slaughtered, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] referred to this morning in testimony that he and I heard. Another branch of Congress is putting itself on record as being willing to take money that comes from that very source in Colorado to help to carry on the business of this Government. Surely the Senator does not want to have that done.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator from Iowa did not the Government take a million dollars from Mr. Rockefeller for the purpose of eradicating the hookworm in this country, and I ask him whether that money did not do great good?

Mr. KENYON. Let Mr. Rockefeller take his money and devote it to those purposes or give it to the Senator's State, but do not let this Government put its seal of approval upon the manner in which Mr. Rockefeller has acquired this money; in fact, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that Mr. Rockefeller was guilty of violating the Sherman Antitrust Act in the Standard Oil case.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WEST. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Georgia protested that it was all right for a church to take the money of a robber?

Mr. WEST. I said they did.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator if he would sanction it.

Mr. WEST. The Senator ought to know me well enough to know that if the church knew that the money it was taking had been obtained by robbing a bank or otherwise, it would be wrong for the church to take it.

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly; I thought that is what the Senator would say.

Mr. WEST. But do you suppose that all the dollars of Mr. Carnegie or Mr. Rockefeller or other people of the country have not been honestly made?

Mr. REED. But the point is, if the church were to take money brought to it by a bank robber, knowing that it was stolen money, the Senator says the church would do wrong.

Mr. WEST. I think if the Senator would take it knowing he was receiving it he would be a particeps criminis.

Mr. REED. Exactly. The point is whether the church knows it. If the church had accepted the money, not knowing its source, of course it could not be held to have done anything wrong, for it had no knowledge of the wrong. In this instance, with the records of the courts and the country black with the story of Mr. Rockefeller's operations, with conviction after conviction of violating the law, with the full knowledge that through the power of this monopoly, through the criminal practices of that monopoly, working extortion little short of robbery, rather than make a slight advance in wages in one of his companies there they hire thugs and murderers, import them into a State, and by his influence have them made militia of the State, and clothes them in the uniform of State authority—with the full knowledge that those men, clothed and armed and practically controlled by this corporation, burned a city of tents in which were men, women, and children, and slaughtered them in a manner that a Mexican would not slaughter his enemies, and the survivors of that carnage, who were also victims of that outrage, are here in the city—mothers of children who were burned to death—here at the doors of Congress crying for justice, I ask the Senator if he is willing to have the United States Government enter into a partnership with that sort of a concern?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WEST. Let me finish what little I have to say. I am not espousing the cause of Mr. Rockefeller. I do not know that he is a party to these crimes that are talked about. That is a corporation, and every man who belongs to a corporation is not responsible for the deeds that its officers do. A man may have his own business and have employees in it who do wrong, and it can not be always traced to the employer.

Mr. REED. It is the one fact that it can not be traced that probably accounts for the fact that a number of distinguished criminals are still at large in the country.

Mr. WEST. There is no doubt about that. I know enough about the criminal law to know that you can not always run a crime down.

Mr. GORE. I should like to call the Senator's attention to a fact he overlooked, stated in the public press, that a committee of the other House called on Mr. Rockefeller, jr., with a view to effecting some sort of a reconciliation in Colorado, and that Mr. Rockefeller answered them that it was a matter of principle and he would make no concession. That fixed the personal responsibility, at least in that instance. Was the Senator aware of that?

Mr. WEST. No, sir; I was not aware of it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I wish, in conjunction with this, the Senator from Georgia would just let me read to him a statement of a couple of women here from Colorado in this city, given this morning.

Mr. WEST. I know nothing about that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I just want to read it as to fixing the responsibility somewhat on Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. WEST. Before the Senator reads that I will ask him if the Rockefellers are not minority stockholders in this concern in Colorado?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They are dominating stockholders. Here is a woman whom I asked, "Are you the wife of a miner? What is your name?" "Yes," said she, "my name is Pearl Jolly. I saw a number of men in uniform." "What uniform?" I asked her. She said she believed the parties were guards hired by Rockefeller. She said, "I saw them dip a broom in buckets and swash something on the tents. I think it was oil." Another woman, Mrs. M. H. Thomas, a very intellectual woman, said, "I am the wife of a miner. I have three children. I did not see the men put the oil on the tents, but I saw men in uniform with torches touch fire to the tents." The bodies of helpless women and children were charred to a crisp, and this in the interest of these scheming diplomats and robbers who have been the curse of our country.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, that is very sad, indeed, and, of course, it is wrong, and the man who did it ought to be prosecuted.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WEST. I do.

Mr. GORE. I do not mean to suggest anything that would harrow the feelings of the surviving victims of the Colorado trouble, but I would like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think that the $250,000 which he has in mind would be better used by the general educational board under Mr. Rockefeller if it were devoted to pensioning the widows and orphans of the men sent to untimely graves in the Colorado strike?

Mr. WEST. I did not exactly understand the Senator.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator think the $250,000 which he is anxious the Government should accept at the hands of the educational board could be better used in pensioning the widows and orphans of the men who were recently sent to untimely graves in Colorado?

Mr. WEST. I can only say that it would create a national fund to that extent, and they could give it that way to them.

Mr. GORE. The General Government does not pension these unhappy victims or their survivors. They have no pensions, and I should like to ask the Senator if he would favor it for that purpose. I should also like to ask him if he would accept a favor from anyone to whom he could not reciprocate the favor?

Mr. WEST. Let me say this. Mr. Peabody has been all through the Southern States and gave liberally to the South for the cause of education and the highest intellectual development there. Does the Senator think because he is a rich man and you do not know how his money was obtained he ought to be condemned by the United States?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment which the Senator is now resisting places no limitation upon the uses which shall be made of the money accruing to the General Education Board. It can be devoted to the cause of education and humanity in the State of Georgia or any other State of the Union. The only point involved here is that the Government of the United States, the most wealthy and the most powerful nation on the globe, does not accept this character of money in order to carry on a fixed and approved policy of the Government.

I wanted to ask the Senator whether he thinks the Government of the United States ought to accept favors and bounties at the hands of Mr. Rockefeller when the Government can not afford to reciprocate those favors and those bounties?

Mr. WEST. Well, Mr. President, they are accepting it, and it is benefiting the country. The Government receives taxes from them. That goes into the coffers of the Government for the purpose of bettering the conditions and uplifting the people.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. WEST. I will yield in a moment. I do not confine it to Rockefeller. If Mr. Carnegie or other rich men of the country can give the great fortunes they have made to the uplift of humanity, and when they are giving these great fortunes away it is to relieve them of this great amount of money, why not let the people of the country take it? If these great fortunes tend to the intellectual development of the people, let them have the consolation in passing to "the pale realms of shade" that they invite euthanasia. If these people are guilty of great infractions of the law, there is no Senator here who would pursue the matter more earnestly than I would in the courts of this great Nation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator realize that under this item of the appropriation bill the money of Mr. Rockefeller has been paying the Government employees their salaries?

Mr. WEST. I thought this money went into the Treasury and was paid out under the direction of the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; it does not. It has been transferred, as I understand it, to the Agricultural Department, and the Agricultural Department, instead of having the men who are employed in the service on the pay roll of the Government, actually pay their salaries from the fund which was furnished by Mr. Rockefeller. Surely the Senator can not think that is right.

Mr. WEST. Does the Government pay this money out that goes into the Treasury?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It does not go into the Treasury, as I understand it.

Mr. WEST. Does Mr. Rockefeller hire these people and pay it himself with this money?

Mr. SHAFROTH. This money goes directly to the Agricultural Department, I understand, and is paid by them to these parties as salaries.

Mr. WEST. My understanding is that these donations were for a specific purpose but went through the proper channels of the Government, and he had nothing to do so far as directing who should be hired or who should be put in office.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. Does he have the opinion that Carnegie's money or Rockefeller's money will not be as effective in exterminating the boll weevil and the hookworm as money from other sources?

Mr. WEST. My impression is that it would be just as effective, and if we could lessen these great fortunes that have been accumulated here it would be for the benefit of mankind generally. I for one, for the purpose of elevating the human race generally, am willing to cut down these great fortunes and let it go to the uplift of humanity.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to say in answer to the question of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that if the money of Rockefeller was used on the boll weevil with the same exterminating effect it had on those little children in Colorado it would stamp out that pest pretty quickly.

Now, in relation to the massacre in Colorado, I wish to say my attention has been called to some facts which I do not think the Senator from Georgia is familiar with or I do not believe he would care to have us vote any of this money to be used for educating the youth of this country.

Mr. WEST. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. I am not familiar with any of the recent investigations, because I have not been before the committees.

Mr. LANE. I am told by persons who have been on the scene that these little children and their mothers retreated into pits which were dug in the ground under the floor of the tents in which they lived, and that after they were fired and became ablaze the smoke and gas settled down and began to smother them. I do not know whether you have ever seen or had anything to do with a person who has been smothered to death. As a physician I have. They die a very miserable and unhappy death.

The small veins on their faces and on their shoulders and necks become engorged and burst under the skin and form echymotic spots. These little children, 11 of them, smothering to death, reached up and tried to get out of the trap they were in. Over them was this burning plank floor, and when afterwards they found them dead in the pits—these little children, one a babe 2 months old, and others 5 or 6 or 8 or 10 years old—their little hands were burned off—burned off in trying to claw their way out. They died like rats in a trap. One mother was shot, and after she died her babe was born motherless into the world.

The Senator from Missouri made a most pathetic speech about a monkey that died with its babe clasped to its breast, and he called down the wrath of heaven on the cruelty of the man who did that deed; but here was one mother with a dead child in her arms, crawling and trying to keep out of gunshot, hauling and pulling another child—a little boy—alongside her, who was shot in attempting to escape, and the boy was shot also.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. LANE. If the Senator will pardon me, I will be through in a moment. It is such little things as these that have prejudiced the American people, if you please to call them prejudiced, and upsets their stomachs when it comes to trying to force them to accept money derived from that sort of a source and going into partnership with it, as is attempted here.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I want to say that I understand the Rockefellers are minority stockholders in that State.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator one question. Does he think the Government ought to take money from them and devote it to these uplift purposes?

Mr. WEST. I think if they give this money, it would be a very good cause to give it to elevate the poor.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator would be willing to take it to elevate the poor?

Mr. WEST. If any criminal has grown very rich, somebody has to have it if he is executed, of course.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent to put into the RECORD the financial statements of the General Education Board which have been made to the Government officials, in order that the Senate may have the benefit of knowing the character of securities, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD,
New York, September 10, 1909.

SECRETARY DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A communication of August 31 from Mr. Frank Pierce, First Assistant Secretary, to Wallace Buttrick, secretary of this board, has been referred to me. Answering the inquiries therein, I would say that the corporation neither owns nor controls any real property other than office equipment, which it would be hard to value.

As to "operating" expenses, I would say that presuming the expenses of administration to be the equivalent of "operating" expenses, the sum of $29,486.19 was expended on that account.

Trusting that this gives you the desired information, I am,

Very truly, yours,

L. G. MYERS,
Assistant Treasurer.

263 FIFTH AVENUE,
New York, August 5, 1909.

Mr. F. T. GATES,
Chairman General Education Board.

MY DEAR SIR: I have examined the accounts of the treasurer of the General Education Board covering the year ended June 30, 1909, and submit herewith a statement of receipts and expenditures for that period showing separately the different contributions to the funds.

All payments made were checked and found to be covered by properly receipted vouchers, except in four cases involving small amounts remitted to the South, and which are receiving the treasurer's attention with a view to obtaining proper receipts; the cash balances were verified by comparison with the accounts of the various depositories.

The securities in the possession of the treasurer were inspected, counted, and found correct.

The securities shown by the records to be held by the Metropolitan Trust Co., the United States Trust Co., and Mr. J. D. Rockefeller were compared with statements furnished by the trust companies and Mr. Rockefeller and found to agree therewith.

Accompanying this report are separate statements of the various funds, income accounts, and investments.

Acknowledgment is hereby made of the usual courtesies extended to me by the treasurer's representatives during the course of the audit.

Respectfully submitted.

(Signed) A. B. BIERCK,
Certified Public Accountant.

WRIGHT, SCHOOLEY & MORSE,
PUBLIC ACCOUNTANTS,
17 West Forty-second Street, New York, August 9, 1910.

F. T. GATES, Esq.,
Chairman General Education Board, New York.

DEAR SIR: We have examined the books and accounts of the General Education Board covering the year ending June 30, 1910, and have verified the figures contained in the annual report of the treasurer and his principal and income and expenditure accounts for each fund.

Properly receipted vouchers were found covering all payments during the year and the balances on deposit in the several banks were reconciled with the bank statements at June 30, 1910. The income received and accrued during the year was also verified in detail and found to be correct.

All securities shown by the records as being in the possession of the treasurer were examined and found to be in order and those shown as held by Mr. John D. Rockefeller were agreed with a statement furnished by Mr. Rockefeller's office.

We carefully checked all transfers of investments between the several funds merged at October 19, 1909, and also the securities included in the gift to the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research under date of June 30, 1910.

We wish to express our appreciation of the many courtesies extended to us by the treasurer and other officers during the course of our work.

Respectfully submitted.

(Signed.) WRIGHT, SCHOOLEY & MORSE.
HAROLD A. WRIGHT.

GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD,
THE JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER FUND,
October 21, 1912.

SAMUEL ADAMS, Esq.,
Acting Secretary Department of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your communication of October 17 to Dr. Wallace Buttrick and have to apologize for the delay in sending you our annual report. This report was not compiled at as early date as usual, owing to the absence of the treasurer in Europe. I trust that no great inconvenience has been suffered. You will find herewith our usual form of report, together with an abstract of same, in accordance with your request.

Yours, respectfully,

L. G. MYERS, Treasurer.

P. S.—I must say frankly, however, that the matter was overlooked upon my return. L. G. M.

[Abstract.]

GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD.

This corporation, which was created by the act of Congress approved January 12, 1903, section 6 of which requires the corporation to annually file with the Secretary of the Interior a report, in writing, stating in detail the property, real and personal, held by the corporation and the expenditure or other use or disposition of the same, or the income thereof during the preceding year, has for its object the promotion of education within the United States. The corporation owns no real estate, its property consisting of securities and money divided into various funds, according to the purpose for which it is to be used.

On June 30, 1912, the capital funds belonging, without restriction, to the board amounted to $31,994,437.58, invested as follows: Bonds, $15,735,423.28; stocks, $16,103,636.18; cash, $155,378.12.

The income from the above funds, together with the income from undisbursed income, including income earned but not received, amounted, during the year, to $1,902,280.81, from which was deducted a loss of $2,853.65 occasioned by the sale of securities representing invested income, leaving a net amount of $1,899,427.16. The balance of income from previous years, as of June 30, 1911, amounting to $4,212,721.81, increased the total to $6,112,148.97.

Disbursements from income during the year were as follows:

Payments on account of appropriations to colleges, universities, etc	$1,018,870.63
Payments on account of appropriations for farmers' cooperative demonstration work carried on by the United States Department of Agriculture	121,798.54
Payments made on account of appropriations for salaries and expenses of professors of secondary education in Southern States	30,356.59
Payments made on account of appropriations for salaries and expenses of negro rural school supervisors	4,000.00
Expenses	33,320.38
Total	1,208,346.14

This leaves an undisbursed balance of income on June 30, 1912, of $4,903,802.83. It is invested as follows: Bonds, $3,315,750.44; stocks, $944,228.49; income receivable, $248,409.40; accounts receivable, $2,177.95; cash, $393,236.55.

It should be noted, however, that against this balance there are unpaid appropriations amounting to $4,661,178.26.

The John D. Rockefeller special fund is a fund which Mr. Rockefeller controls both as to principal and income.

In a previous report a gift to the University of Chicago of $9,912,540.74 was published. One-tenth of this gift (or securities and cash representing it) is payable each year. The income from the unpaid balance, however, remains the property of the board subject to Mr. Rockefeller's direction. This accounts for the disparity between the balance of the John D. Rockefeller special fund and the income account of the same name. On June 30, 1912, the principal fund amounted to $1,002,150.25, invested as follows: Bonds, $930,622.50; stocks, $68,633.32; cash, $2,894.43. No gifts were made from this fund during year.

The income earned during year was $486,872.57, the balance from previous years ($718,569.91) increasing the amount to $1,205,442.48.

Disbursements during the year were as follows:

Gifts to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research	$222,283.65
Gifts to the University of Chicago	20,000.00
Expenses	1,533.20
Total	243,816.85

This leaves a balance of $961,625.63, which is invested as follows: Bonds, $583,234.39; stocks, $147,970.20; income receivable, $94,637.29; cash, $135,783.75.

The Anna T. Jeanes fund, the income to be used for negro rural schools, still amounts to $200,000. It is invested as follows: Bonds, $182,877.51; stocks, $16,645; cash, $477.49.

The income from this fund during the year was $9,240.99. Added to the balance from the previous year the total available income amounted to $14,363.25. Of this, $4,540 was appropriated and paid to various schools, and $40.72 paid out for expenses, leaving a balance of $9,782.53, all in cash.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I desire to make some brief observations on the question under discussion.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is my desire, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, to finish the bill and to move to table the motion. I would not, however, be warranted in preventing the Senator from speaking.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me just a few moments before he addresses the Senate, I desire to give briefly the history connected with this fund, as I have recently heard it.

I shall vote for the committee report; I shall vote for the proposition to make the appropriation direct from the National Treasury for this work; but in doing so I wish to state that I consider that the fund as heretofore contributed has done a great service. I am not moved to appropriate the money from the National Treasury by any adverse feeling toward the past use of this fund. I have recently learned how the fund was first furnished. Dr. Buttrick traveled through the South with Mr. Ogden and became very much interested in the agricultural progress there being made. In Texas he came in contact with the work of Dr. Knapp and became very much impressed with the results he was accomplishing. Dr. Buttrick came back to Washington, saw the Secretary of Agriculture, and asked him why that work was not done much more extensively. The Secretary of Agriculture explained his view of constitutional limitations as to the use of funds in such work. It was then that Dr. Buttrick arranged with the General Educational Board to tender Dr. Knapp an additional fund for the enlargement of his work, leaving entirely to Dr. Knapp the selection of every agent and of every employee, he having nothing to do with the work and not making public the fact that Dr. Knapp obtained the money through the General Educational Board. This fund not only furnished farm demonstrators and aided the boll-weevil fight, but by its use boys' corn clubs and girls' canning clubs were formed.

I have a copy of the agreement made between Secretary Wilson and Dr. Buttrick with reference to this matter, and I think it only fair to send it to the Secretary's desk and let it be read.

My own view on the subject is that we have passed beyond the stage that we occupied at the time Secretary Wilson thought it impossible to obtain an appropriation for such work. The whole country has recognized that this farm demonstration work is a legitimate public benefit for the public welfare, for the general welfare, to which the National Government can contribute; and I believe the use of this fund by Dr. Knapp taught the value of the work and led up to the present public sentiment in favor of it. I think now the whole country recognizes its value. Now the country approves and Congress is ready to carry it on. As it is for the general welfare, I think it far better that we should pay for it out of the National Treasury than to accept a continued contribution from private sources; but in taking this course, I wish it understood that I, for one, recognize that the contribution has done good. Secretary Wilson did a public service when he accepted it. I know it has been a great blessing to my section; and having seen that blessing I am willing to bear evidence to it and to express my appreciation of the fact that we received it and of what the Secretary of Agriculture—Mr. Wilson—did when he helped turn it to the valuable use to which it was put, although to-day the proper thing to do is to carry the burden at the expense of the Public Treasury, and let men who have funds which they desire to contribute to a good service use them in some other way. I have sent the agreement to the desk, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

EXHIBIT A.

MEMORANDUM OF UNDERSTANDING BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND THE GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD FOR COOPERATION IN EXTENDING THE FARMERS' COOPERATIVE COTTON DEMONSTRATION WORK.

The General Education Board, believing that much good has been and can be accomplished by demonstration instruction to farmers upon the plan of the farmers' cooperative cotton demonstration work of the Bureau of Plant Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, conducted by S. A. Knapp, special agent, has asked to cooperate financially in the extension of this work.

Therefore, the said Department of Agriculture and the above-mentioned General Education Board have come to a mutual understanding, as follows:

First. The farmers' cooperative work, in which the General Education Board is to become interested, shall be entirely distinct in territory and finance from that carried on solely by the Department of Agriculture, the said territory and the amount to be expended each year to be determined by mutual conference.

Second. To the extent of the annual appropriation made as stated in the preceding paragraph, the General Education Board, it is understood, is to pay all expenses directly and incidentally incurred in conducting the farmers' cooperative cotton demonstration work in this extended territory.

Third. The United States Department of Agriculture shall have supervision of the work and shall appoint all special agents for this extended territory in the same way that they are now appointed, and the said agents shall be under control of said department in every respect as fully as any other agents of the department.

Fourth. A full account of all expenses incurred in said territory, with proper vouchers, shall be rendered monthly to said General Education Board, and duplicates of same shall be filed with the United States Department of Agriculture. Also monthly reports shall be made to the General Education Board and the department showing the progress of the work, and at the close of the year a final report shall be made covering the year's work.

Either party may withdraw from cooperation under this memorandum on the 1st day of January of any year by giving three months' previous notice of such intention.

WALLACE BUTTRICK,
Secretary General Education Board.
JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only wish to say one word further. I never knew of this contract until within the last 30 days. I have been familiar with the farmers' cooperative work in my own State and in other Southern States; I have met Dr. Knapp; I have seen the work of his demonstrators; but until I became familiar with the Agricultural appropriation bill as a Member of the Senate I thought every dollar of the fund came from the National Treasury. So modest have these people been in the way in which they made the contribution, that as to the beneficiaries, the men employed, in my opinion, very few, if any of them had any knowledge of the fact that the money came from any other source except from the National Treasury. The use of this fund has been of great service to the South, and it has been given generously and modestly, free from anything except the public good. I wish justice done in this matter, and I think that this statement is only fair under the circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to ask two or three questions, to begin with, and the first one is: Is an investigation of this strike in Colorado being conducted by a committee of the other House of Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is the Senator asking me?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I am asking some Senator who may be familiar with the facts.

Mr. KENYON. I can answer that question. It has been investigated by a committee in the other House, which is now waiting for briefs on either side before rendering a report; but they have not investigated the matter to which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has referred, which occurred after that investigation closed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One thing further, perhaps, should be added. This money is no longer in any sense the money of Mr. Rockefeller. The General Education Board, as trustees under the deed of trust, entirely own and control the money.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Georgia if the income of that board does not come, in part, from investments in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., whose propery is located where this trouble now exists?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know; I never heard that before.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I think, if the Senator will examine the matter, he will find that a part of the revenues of the General Education Board come from the Colorado mining district where this disturbance is now going on.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I must claim the floor for a few moments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to say just a few words?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no information at all on that subject. The only view I have in connection with the expenditure of money for this purpose is that I am cordially in favor of the Treasury carrying this expense. I do not think the National Government should receive it from an individual or from an organization which has a fund given to it for philanthropic purposes. I think our Treasury is strong enough to pay for anything that ought to be done for the general welfare of the people of this country, and I believe in paying for it in that way; but funds from the General Education Board have been used in this way for a number of years; and having been used I believe with the highest purpose of beneficial service to my own State, and my own State having received part of the benefits from that service, without regard to the Colorado matter, about which I do not know—I did not know that a part of that fund was derived from stock invested in Colorado companies—I think it only fair to acknowledge what I believe to be the efficient way in which the money has been handled and the good which has been derived from its use.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] having answered my first question, I will ask the Senator——

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator allow me just one sentence touching what the Senator from Georgia has said?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will, and then I will begin over again.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say that my understanding is, though I may be in error, that the voting power of the stock held in the General Education Board is still exercised by Mr. Rockefeller. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Iowa whether both sides of this controversy have been heard by the committee?

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that they have been represented, as I understand, by counsel, and that counsel are now preparing briefs to be submitted to the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. No report has been made as yet?

Mr. KENYON. No report has been made. I asked the chairman of the committee this morning in relation to that, and he stated that they were waiting for the briefs.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not aware of the fact that an investigation was being conducted. I will now ask some Senator familiar with the matter whether I read correctly awhile ago that the first overt act in this unhappy controversy was the killing of a marshal and, I believe, certain other persons by the strikers? I will ask the Senator from Colorado if he has any knowledge of that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not remember the circumstances that precipitated the conflict, but I do not think the last matter, as to the tent colony, was precipitated in that way. An investigation was had, following which a report was made condemning certain members of the militia, and since then there has been a court-martial proceeding against the officers who were in command at that time, and that proceeding has not ended as yet.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, it seems to me——

Mr. GALLINGER. I must be permitted to proceed, or, at least, the Senator must get my consent to interrupt me.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to state this——

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; if the Senator gets consent through the Chair, perhaps I will yield to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asks the Senator from New Hampshire whether he yields to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only want to suggest that I think it well that this should be known: We speak of the militia. An organization known as the Baldwin-Phelps Guards, which is a private organization, controlled and managed by Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Phelps, were marched into that district and immediately after were clothed with seeming official authority by being sworn in as militia, when they were paid by the Baldwin-Phelps people, who in turn were paid by the coal companies and the mine companies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Doubtless all those——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. So it is the same old breed of dogs that we met in West Virginia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Answering the Senator from Colorado, I will say that I did not refer to the burning of the tent colony, but to events which occurred prior to that time. But doubtless all those facts will be developed at the hearing. The matters that developed in connection with the West Virginia strike have not yet been satisfactorily cleared up as to the relative guilt of the various parties who were involved in that controversy, notwithstanding the Senator from New Jersey is pleased to call those on one side of the question "dogs." Now, Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I must decline to yield further, Mr. President. To my mind it is extremely unfortunate that a debate such as has been conducted during the last half hour in this Chamber should be held. The honor of the State of Colorado is at stake, and I apprehend the State of Colorado will, through its officials, do its duty in this matter to the fullest possible extent. A committee of another body has the subject under investigation—I did not know that before this moment—and we ought patiently to await their report before we indulge in the extreme and lurid language that we have heard this afternoon, condemnatory of certain individuals who are in some way connected with that unfortunate affair. I do not know either Mr. Rockefeller senior or Mr. Rockefeller junior; hence I make no defense of them, leaving the entire matter to be impartially investigated.

In addition to what I have said, Mr. President, if I have read correctly, a large minority of the strikers belong to the labor union, and they made a demand that the men who own and conduct the mines should not employ any but union men. That may not be so, but I have read it. In other words, a minority of the miners was to dictate the policy of the company in the matter of employment.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. KERN. I have it from Mr. Hay, who is a highly reputable man connected with the miners' union, one of the most conscientious men whom I have ever met in labor circles, that in their proposition to arbitrate, which they make now and have made at all times, they were and are entirely willing that the question of union or nonunion should be left out, not even insisting on that, for the reason that 95 per cent of the miners in that field are union miners. That is one reason; but they are entirely willing now, as he stated to me, that the question be submitted to the arbitration of any body of five men that the President might select, with the question of unionism entirely eliminated.

Mr. GALLINGER. But was it not a fact, I will ask the Senator, that in the inception of this trouble that demand was made?

Mr. KERN. That demand, of course, is always made as to whether they shall be treated with collectively or individually.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to say for myself that if that demand should be made upon me under similar circumstances, it would not be granted. I might arbitrate, but I certainly never should grant a demand of that kind, made by men representing, as I understand it, a minority of the laboring people.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. I merely want to state to the Senator that, while I do not pretend to be familiar with all the history of this controversy, a week or two ago I had a conversation with Representative FOSTER, of Illinois, who told me that he had had some telegraphic communication with young Rockefeller, in New York, and that it appeared from this interchange of telegrams that the reason why young Rockefeller refused to arbitrate this matter was that there was an insistance upon recognition of the union. Representative FOSTER informed me that he got into communication with the heads of the organization and requested, if there were any such insistence as that, that in the interest of the general good it be withdrawn. They not only authorized him to say that they did not make any such insistence, but, as I recollect the conversation, he stated that they had not made any such insistence. According to the last information I have been able to gather, Representative FOSTER had received no reply from Rockefeller to his telegram to the effect that these men were willing to arbitrate, waiving altogether the question of the recognition of the union.

Mr. GALLINGER. The only further suggestion I desire to make on that point is, that I think I am correct in saying that that condition was insisted upon in the early part of this controversy. It may have been changed since.

Mr. President, we have had several very unfortunate conditions somewhat similar to this during the last 25 years. I remember some years ago that there were 35 Chinamen tortured, killed, and burned in the State of Wyoming. I will not attempt to enumerate the horrors which they endured at the hands of laboring men, not one of whom, I believe, was a citizen of this country, either by birth or naturalization. It was a horrible affair, so grievous that, as I recall the matter, our Government paid China an indemnity of over $100,000 for the assaults committed upon the citizens of that Empire; and the poor creatures who were not killed were brutally driven from the community, a perfect reign of terror existing. Other similar occurrences have happened during our history as a Nation, some of them very revolting; but it would have been unfortunate had those matters, before they had been fully investigated, been acrimoniously debated in this or the other House of Congress.

Mr. President, I am an optimist, and yet I fear for my country when I see what is going on in this Nation to-day. I think every thoughtful man who looks upon the controversy now raging between capital and labor will pause and ask himself the serious question whether it is not true that the greatest danger that confronts us is not from any foreign nation engaging us in war, but is here at home in this controversy that has raged and is raging, and very likely will continue to rage, between capital on the one hand and labor on the other.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], with that great, big heart of his, always takes the side of the oppressed, as he regards it; and with rather extreme views, tells us what he has seen and what he has heard in connection with these matters; and yet, it seems to me, the Senator from New Jersey is sometimes laboring under a misapprehension.

There was a strike a while ago in the city of Lawrence, in the State of Massachusetts. We had a debate here about it, and women and children were brought from Lawrence to Washington as they have now been brought from Colorado. I did not participate in the debate, beyond suggesting that we ought to be patient, and await a careful scrutiny of the facts developed by an impartial investigation of everything connected with the unfortunate affair. That strike passed away, and the strikers returned to their work. Some damage was done to property, a very large amount. Some lives were lost; only two or three, I believe. Policemen were assaulted and harmed, and strikers were assaulted and harmed. The men who led that strike were the same men who to-day are claiming that they have a right to destroy property; and that they have a right to murder, in what they conceive to be, the interest of labor.

Take the utterances of Mr. Ettor; take the utterances of Mr. Haywood, who, on Boston Common, declared that he was above the law, and defied the law officers of Massachusetts to prevent him from doing anything he desired to do, ostensibly in the interests of labor, but, as I look at it, to the great detriment of the cause of labor in this country.

A few months ago we created an Industrial Commission. Excellent men were placed on that commission by the President, and one most excellent and estimable woman, Mrs. Harriman, was placed on that commission. They are going over the country investigating these questions, with a view to recommending to Congress legislation on the subject. The commission held a session in New York the other day. I want to read what one man said to that commission; and there is no doubt that it was actually said.

NEW YORK, May 21.

Vincent St. John, a pale, rather insignificant little man, calmly told the members of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, in session in the City Hall to-day, how the 100,000 or more members of the Industrial Workers of the World, of which he is the prime mover, are pledged to violence—murder if necessary—the destruction of goods and property, and violation of the law they deem necessary to gain their point.

"The point with us is to gain our end," said St. John. "It does not matter to us how we gain that end. If violence against human life is necessary, all right; the end justifies the means. If it means the ruin of property, all right. Again the end justifies the means.

"If it means the isolation of a factory, the ruining of raw or finished material inside the factory or outside, all right. Again it is a case of the end justifying the means.

"Do we believe in agreements between the members of the locals of the I. W. W. and owners of industries? No; we are against working agreements of any kind, for any length of time. That is where we differ from the trades-unions. We are a step farther. It is our belief that the workman loses by making a contract as a member with the owner of a mill, factory, or other plant."

While St. John spoke, Joseph Ettor, accompanied by a young woman who wore neither hat nor coat, sat in the front row and nodded his head approvingly.

St. John went on to explain that if a local of the I. W. W. agrees to-day to work for a specified wage it has a perfect right to break that agreement to-morrow. If the local stands by its agreement, it is thrown out of the I. W. W. as unfit to be affiliated with the organization.

Mr. President, that man does not speak for the trades-unions or the honest nonunion men of this country. As I understand, Mr. Gompers—to his credit, be it said—has expressly disclaimed all responsibility for that utterance. Yet here is a man who represents more than 100,000 people who, with others, are exciting the poor people in the industrial sections of our country to violence and to the destruction of property. It is a very serious matter, Mr. President; and when I contemplate it, I sometimes wonder what the fate of our Republic is to be, unless we are calm and judicious and judicial in our consideration of these questions. It is a very serious problem.

Mr. President, so far as this unfortunate matter in Colorado is concerned, I hope, as we all hope, that the facts will be developed, and that to all guilty men or guilty women connected with the affair, whether they are rich or poor, whether they are on the one side or the other, adequate punishment will be meted out. I deprecate, however, and I can not help saying it, a violent discussion of a matter of this kind in the Senate before all the facts have been developed and reported on, and before any of us is justified in forming an opinion that may not, at least, have some doubt in it.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say. I am a friend of the laboring man. I know all about his trials. I have been one of them. My sympathy for them is just as strong as that of any other Member of this body. I want them to have all the rights that are guaranteed to them by the laws and the Constitution of the United States, but I also want every other class to have the same protection. When, however, any man—whether it be Mr. St. John, or Mr. Ettor, or any other individual—openly advocates sabotage, the destruction of property, the destruction of machines in the mills, which they have advocated, and, if necessary, as Mr. St. John said, violence to the extent of murder to carry their point, it becomes a very, very serious problem, which ought not to be determined through our sympathies or our partial knowledge of the facts connected with the controversy, but it should receive the careful, considerate, and unprejudiced consideration of us all, to the end that the rights of all parties shall be ascertained and safeguarded.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, while I am a young man, I have already lived long enough to learn both the danger and the injustice of returning a verdict against any man or against any combination of men upon ex parte testimony alone. Lawlessness and violence are to be condemned by law-abiding citizens without reference to the occupation or the financial standing of the lawbreaker. In a recent strong editorial Mr. Gompers condemned in unmeasured terms all those who counsel or who countenance violence and murder.

I have been deeply and duly impressed by the solemnity of the words of the venerable senior Senator from New Hampshire. He has described dread symptoms of a dreaded social disease. No man can look upon those symptoms and contemplate their significance without trembling for the future.

The resolution on the part of the committee of the Senate to divorce the General Government from the General Education Board does not limit the future possibilities of service of the income accruing to the General Education Board. There are many objects, there are many services of philanthrophy, of charity, and I may say of patriotism, to which this money can be dedicated. There are many who will accept these contributions without scruple and will doubtless apply them to humane and to beneficent purposes. There are those, however, who think the Government of the United States ought not to accept money or contributions from the General Education Board because it has received its endowment from Mr. Rockefeller. The Standard Oil Co. has been adjudged by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a violator of the laws of the land. There are patriotic citizens who sincerely believe that the Government ought not to accept contributions from a corporation of this kind. There are many patriotic people who believe that the General Government can not afford to render any favor to or confer any bounty upon the Standard Oil Co., and there are people, whose sense of propriety is not to be questioned, who are reluctant to accept favors from those to whom they can not return or reciprocate favors.

When this subject was under consideration before, I purposely avoided giving utterance to a single word on the subject. As the debate has disclosed, there are those outside the Senate who believe this money is red with human blood and dripping with human tears. I respect the opinions of those people because they are sincere in desiring a divorcement of the Government from the General Education Board.

I based my position in the committee and in the Senate upon this ground: This farm demonstration work in the South has become a fixed, an approved, and a permanent policy on the part of the Government of the United States. I feel, and many people feel, that this great, opulent Government is able to defray the expense of any and of all policies designed for the betterment of the citizenship of the United States. I am firm in that conviction, and upon that conviction I have based my advocacy of this divorce.

Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, may I say a word before that is done? I should like to ask a question.

Mr. GORE. Very well, if the Senator wishes to ask a question I will withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. WEST. In making this motion I did not intend to provoke such a debate here this afternoon. I understood hitherto that that had been the case, and I wish to know now, if Mr. Rockefeller or Mr. Carnegie or any other wealthy man contributed money, whether he would in any way directly control the services of those under the Government by this money?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], while he may not be able to answer the question directly, can undoubtedly shed light on the subject.

Mr. KENYON. I will simply say to the Senator from Georgia that possibly some two months ago I introduced a resolution here calling on the Secretary of Agriculture to transmit to the Senate the names of the employees of the Department of Agriculture who were paid by the General Education Board, and also a statement of the general relations between the General Education Board and the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WEST. Are they receiving the money directly?

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that the Secretary very promptly responded, and he showed in the statement that there were about 600 employees who were paid $1 by the Government and the balance of their compensation out of the money of the General Education Board. If the Senator will consult that communication, which is in the RECORD, I think his question will be satisfactorily answered.

Mr. WEST. Were those Government officers who just received $1 from the Government?

Mr. KENYON. They were on the pay roll of the Government; and, as I understand, the man who is at the head of the farm demonstration work received $1 per month from the Government and $625 per month from the Rockefeller Fund. I am not exactly clear whether the $250,000 was given to the Department of Agriculture in a lump sum, to be used by them, or whether it came at different times from the General Education Board; but I think it was given in a lump sum to pay these employees.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that this debate this afternoon has provoked such trouble in the Senate and that there has been so much feeling exhibited. I do not know Mr. Rockefeller; I never have seen him in my life. I know that I feel for the poor people of this country as much as any Senator in this body; but I have always taken the view that if the rich would give liberally of their means toward the uplifting of the downtrodden, our country generally would be much improved.

I do not chide a man for making money if he makes it honestly. I think if he has the talent to do it he ought to do it, and then he ought to give liberally to the cause of humanity and to the spread of Christianity. I want to say, however, that if this money goes directly to the support of officers of the Government, and they feel that they are getting it, not from the Government, but from some wealthy man, I withdraw my motion to strike out the proviso.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session for seven hours. I am quite sure it would be impossible to get a quorum here at this late hour. Therefore I am not going to offer the amendments to the bill I had intended to offer, now that it is in the Senate.

Mr. President, this bill never should become a law. There are so many amendments that are indefensible, undemocratic, and unconstitutional that I marvel they have ever been supported by the Senate. I dare say, without believing there is a single Senator who will doubt the statement, that if these items in this appropriation bill had been offered to the Senate by themselves in a separate bill, you could not have found 10 Senators who would have voted for them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senator made the same objections to the Agricultural appropriation bill in the past?

Mr. SMOOT. I say to the Senator that there are items in this bill which have never been offered to a bill before, or anything like them. I would have done so if they had been offered. I also desire the Senator to know that in my experience here in the Senate such amendments never would have been considered, and Senators never would have thought of offering them on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. To what particular amendments does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMOOT. It is too late now to go into the details of the amendments. The Senator has attended the sessions of the Senate pretty constantly and watched the proceedings carefully, and he knows what amendments have been objected to and discussed. Therefore it is not necessary at this time to go into that matter.

As I stated before, I do not want to ask for a yea-and-nay vote. I am quite sure we could not get a quorum here to-night, and I do not want another Sabbath to pass thinking of this measure and the items which have been put upon the bill here and discussed in the last two weeks. Therefore I shall say nothing more at this time, but I shall rely upon the better judgment of the members of the conference on the part of another body, believing that they will not agree to items which have been placed on the bill here, that never should have been placed upon an appropriation bill, and that never would have been supported by the Senate of the United States if they had been offered alone as separate measures.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. GORE, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice at this time that on Monday, at the conclusion of the debate for that day on House bill 14385, the unfinished business, I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration House bill 14034, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 25, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 23, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who are everywhere present, unseen, yet an overwhelming spiritual force, to uphold, sustain, and guide Thy children in their efforts to do the right, take away from us all unworthy desires and ignoble thoughts, that we may receive the full benefit of Thy holy influence and do the work Thou hast given us to do with all diligence and perseverance. In the spirit of the Lord, Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SULLIVAN.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 21st day of June, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. TIMOTHY D. SULLIVAN, late a Representative from the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is H. R. 15657. The House will resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and other bills embraced in the special order of the House.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is one to which I intend to give my support. I am not going to undertake to discuss the trust question from the legal standpoint. I think the pending bill is a lawyer's bill, a lawyer's conception of the trust problem and methods of handling it. I am not a lawyer and have no technical knowledge whatever of the law. I have made some little study of this question from the economic standpoint, and in the brief time allotted to me I propose to discuss the trust question on a fundamental basis, on the basis of political economy. And I want to begin by saying that it was no mere jingle of words in which Oliver Goldsmith declared that—

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

The people of the United States during the last quarter of a century have witnessed a concentration of wealth and power so enormous as to be appalling, and this concentration still goes on with hardly a sign of abatement. The growth of the trust, so called, has been the phenomenon of the time. It has marked an industrial change more startling by far than any that has ever before been recorded in the history of the world, more startling, indeed, than that involved in the harnessing of steam and electricity. It has noted the rapid passing of the individual and the appearance upon the stage of a vast impersonal force which reduces the social unit from positions of independent initiative to a mere part in a huge machine. It is no longer easy for pluck and brains and energy to win in a struggle which involves relatively new and strange conditions. Pluck and brains and energy are still factors of success, but they no longer play the part they once enacted in the upbuilding of independence and the scoring of individual triumphs. They have become merchantable quantities, like common labor; they are bought in the open market by the highest bidder, and the highest bidder is that industrial creation of privilege which upsets the law of competition and by the forces of monopoly controls the field of production.

It is not my purpose here to detail the frightful process of concentration. To do so would be to burden my remarks with stupendous figures and to confuse the mind with facts that almost pass belief. Let me, rather, invite a consideration of the situation in its moral phase, casting aside all questions of expediency and of circumstance and looking only at the matter from the standpoint of right reason. Concentration in itself is not a bad thing. It is bad only when it involves something besides mere concentration. A thousand men working together can do more than a thousand times as much as one man working alone. It is only when men work together in large numbers that the enormous advantages of a division of labor are possible. And in like manner the concentration of capital is in the direction of economy. It is possible enormously to increase the efficiency of capital by massing it, as in a mighty steamship or a huge factory or a great mill. It must be borne in mind that money is not capital. Capital is wealth used in the production of more wealth; and money is not wealth, it is merely the representative of wealth, a tool employed for the facilitation of exchange. And it does not matter in the least what sort of money it may be so long as it passes current. The small open boat used in carrying goods is capital, but the small open boat is a less efficient means of transportation than a great steamship; and it is an advantage to the world when a hundred owners of small open boats get together and build a mighty leviathan of the deep into which thousands of tons of freight may be packed and safely carried across the multitudinous seas with an expenditure of labor far less relatively than was required in the hazardous ventures of the sloop and the schooner. The harm is therefore not in this massing of capital in noble ships and great factories and huge mills. It must be looked for elsewhere. And we shall find it, perhaps, in the special privileges with which certain aggregations of capital have surrounded and buttressed themselves. These special privileges appear in many forms, but they all possess a common character; they involve the use of a private taxing power, and whether they wield this in the shape of a tariff which enables them to avoid competition and sell their products at an arbitrary figure, as in the case of the Steel Trust, or whether they wield it in the shape of royalties exacted for the use of natural opportunities, as in the case of the Hard Coal Trust, which until lately was also shielded to an extent by tariff laws, the effect is the same.

They are enabled to command service without rendering service; they fix prices at what traffic will bear; their extortion is limited only by the ability of the people to sustain it. There may be pretenses of cheapening commodities, as in the case of oil; but commodities controlled by monopoly are cheapened in price only by their debasement in quality. Coal oil is cheaper per gallon, it is true; but it is also true that it is lower in standard; its illuminating power has been decreased. And the same is true throughout the whole list of trust articles. If prices have been nominally lowered, they have been relatively increased by the act of adulteration or debasement. The trust always takes everything it can get.

NO CORNERING OF THE NORTH WIND.

It should be observed that trusts do not attempt to corner the north wind. They seek to get control of things that are limited in quantity, and so every really effective trust in the long run must be one that in some form is a landlord. Take the Paper Trust. This trust for years was protected from foreign competition by a tariff on manufactured paper and by a tariff on wood pulp, which is the raw material of paper. But the Paper Trust would soon have gone to the wall had it been solely dependent upon the tariff. The tariff certainly aided it in victimizing the publishers; it enabled the trust for a time to increase prices by 33⅓ per cent. Yet if the tariff had been its only bulwark, its career would have been as short lived and as disastrous as that of the famous Oatmeal Trust. It will be remembered that when the Oatmeal Trust put up the price of its commodity a hundred or possibly a thousand mills in all parts of the country awoke to the fact that they could grind oats as easily as wheat and corn, and just at the moment the trust was flushing with its success the independent manufacturers flooded the market with their product and the trust went to the wall. Its disaster taught other trust managers a lesson which they were not slow to learn, and now every trust which can hope to be more than temporarily effective as a taxing power is in control of something more than tools and machinery. Thus the Paper Trust set out to gain control of the sources of supply; it acquired practically all the spruce timber in the United States, and, in addition, it secured control of all the water power available to the timber supply. It was thus able to dominate the market until the tariff barrier against foreign paper was torn down by a Democratic Congress. Independent mills could get neither the wood nor the water, and they were thus utterly unable to enter into an effective competition. Yet had they then been permitted, as they are now permitted, to import spruce logs from Canada, where spruce abounds, they could have given the trust most serious trouble.

WHERE THE STRENGTH LIES.

The Steel Trust finds its strength in the ownership of ore beds. The same is true of the Copper Trust. The Hard Coal Trust is obviously a child of landlordism, fed and nursed until the passage of the Underwood bill by a tariff on soft coal. The Lead Trust, the Beef Trust, the Standard Oil Trust, the Sugar Trust, and, above all, the Railroad Trust, in the final analysis, are all founded upon the monopoly of certain limited natural opportunities. It is true that some trusts which own no natural opportunities flourish and would continue to flourish were the tariff repealed which protects them in greater or less degree even under the new schedules from foreign competition. But it will be found that in every such case the trust in question is a collateral or dependent of some trust which does control certain natural opportunities. The Beef Trust is largely the offshoot of the railways; it flourished on the discriminating freight rates which it was long able, and which it may still be able, to command; and this trust was not only able by its relations with the railways to extort tribute from the consumers of meat, but was also able in many cases to depress the prices of stock upon the hoof.

The strength of a monopoly is in its taxing power. Never in the service it may render. Always in that which it may withhold. Thus it happens that a monopoly which to-day can levy but a trifling tax upon the public is to-morrow able to impose a crushing burden of tribute. Take the gas monopoly of Chicago, for an example. There was a time years ago, at the time the monopoly was first granted, when the cost of service figured in the rates charged. Later, the charge was fixed entirely by what the consumer would bear. Prof. Bemis was able to show beyond any possibility of dispute that the tribute exacted from the consumer in the good old days of unrestrained and unregulated monopoly was at least 50 per cent of the price charged. In other words, the consumer paid 50 cents for gas, including a fair profit on the investment, and 50 cents for tribute.

Can good citizenship tolerate the exercise of such private taxing powers? Is it not bound to protect itself and the public against all exactions save service for service? It is easy to say that monopoly gives service for service, but it is hard to prove. Monopoly may and often does exact royal tribute from industry without rendering any service at all in return. Examples of this might be multiplied, but one case from Michigan, cited by the commissioner of labor of that State in one of his reports, will suffice.

STORY OF THE COLBY MINE.

The illustration relates to the Colby mine, and the history of this mine is interesting and instructive. It will stand as an admirable type of a thousand other cases which enforce the point which I desire to make. This Colby mine cost the owners $1.25 an acre. They never spent a cent upon it for improvements, but they leased the privilege of taking out the ore on a royalty of 40 cents a ton to the Colbys, who in turn leased it to Morse & Co. for 52½ cents per ton royalty. Morse & Co. contracted with a Capt. Selwood to take the ore out and deliver it on the cars for the sum of 87½ cents per ton. Capt. Selwood in his turn got a capitalist who owned a steam shovel to dig the ore and put it on the cars—all that he had contracted with Morse & Co. to do—for the sum of 12½ cents per ton. This was in the year 1885; and the ore, which was as easily dug as gravel from a gravel pit, brought loaded on the cars $2.80 a ton. Out of this $2.80 a ton the share of the mine owner was 40 cents a ton; Colby's, 12½ cents; Capt. Selwood's share, after paying 12½ cents, as above mentioned, for the work of production, was 75 cents; and the remainder, or $1.40 per ton, was at once the share and profit of Morse & Co. In the year in question there was mined 84,312 tons. At $2.80 a ton delivered on the cars ready for transportation it brought the sum of $236,073.60. Let me recapitulate:

84,312 tons, at $2.80 per ton	$236,073.60
Owners' royalty, at 40 cents per ton	33,724.80
Colby's profit, at 12½ cents per ton	10,539.00
Morse & Co.'s profit, at $1.40 per ton	118,036.80
Selwood's profit, at 75 cents a ton	63,234.00
Capitalist's share for capital and labor in production	10,539.00
Total	236,073.60

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman state where that mine was located?

Mr. BAILEY. In Michigan. I copy this from the report of the labor commissioner of Michigan.

Up to the close of the period covered by the report from which I have quoted the total output of this mine was 1,116,418 tons. Since then the output has probably been increased, but the figures are not available. Nor do they matter for the purposes of this argument. What I wish to observe is that this mine has given something more than a comfortable living to each of four beneficiaries who performed absolutely no service in exchange for it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to yield.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the gentleman what is the product of that mine?

Mr. BAILEY. Iron ore. The only person who did any work was the capitalist, and his share, for the capital and labor employed in mining and placing the ore on the cars, was less than 5 per cent of the total value of the product. In other words, monopoly claimed and got 95 per cent of the product and capital and labor divided between them 5 per cent. The difference represents the value of a private taxing power. It represents what privilege demands from the toiler for access to natural opportunities. It represents the difference between natural wages and the wages fixed by legal restrictions.

Now, I wish to inquire how we, as Democrats, can sustain so glaring a perversion of natural law? Under just conditions, ought not the product go to the producers? What possible title in morals can the men who get 95 per cent of the product of the Colby mine show to that product? They have performed no labor; they have rendered no service; they have expended no capital; they have done nothing whatever but stand between labor and capital and the natural opportunity. Did they make the iron ore? Did they create the demand for its use in the production of steel? Certainly not. They simply forestalled the opportunity and waited the time when labor and capital were so pressed by necessity that they would yield 95 per cent of their joint product for the bare privilege of access to the ore bed.

If this is true of ore mining, if monopoly taxes labor and capital 95 per cent for permission to produce, can we doubt that the same is true in coal mining, in silver mining, in lead mining, in lumbering, in quarrying, in all the various fields which have become subject to the forestaller? And if monopoly has learned the trick of levying a private tax upon capital and labor, compelling them to yield an enormous tribute for which no conceivable return is offered, can it be supposed that industry in general, that capital and labor in other lines, in manufacturing, in building, in commercial pursuits, in printing and merchandising and personal service, are exempt from exaction? If labor and capital in ore mining must pay 95 per cent of their product for bare opportunity, what do you suppose steel workers pay, what do you suppose clerks and small tradesmen pay, what do you think bricklayers and carpenters and blacksmiths and painters pay, what must teachers and musicians and preachers pay? Or to put it in another way, if labor and capital could freely engage in ore mining and retain their entire product undiminished by a private tax, how long would labor consent to work for the wages it is now glad to accept? For it should be remembered that this Colby mine is no isolated instance. It is typical. It illustrates the whole system of monopoly production under which we are working; and it is inconceivable that ore miners alone would consent to yield 95 per cent of their product as tribute while coal miners and lumbermen and steel workers were required to yield relatively less.

HOW WAGES ARE DETERMINED.

The truth is that on the average throughout all industry wages are determined, not by the product, as they should be, but by what monopoly leaves after it has taken its tribute. This any man may see who has eyes to see. And when you have been told, as we are often told, that wages of labor have advanced, the statement is made in clear defiance not only of the fact but of right reason, as one may readily perceive if one will but stop to consider that in the last analysis wages are governed by what may be obtained by the application of labor to the best free land in use. That the best free land in use must be very poor indeed is shown in the fact that in agriculture from a third to half the crop is willingly paid by tenants for the use of appropriated land; and since labor in the primary industry secures but half its product, less taxes, can you for a moment believe that labor in the secondary or more elaborate industries is relatively more fortunate? The reverse is probably if not demonstrably true, as must appear when we consider that in agriculture alone comparative freedom of opportunity is left. Farming is still free or largely free from trust control, yet even in farming the independent farm owner is fast disappearing, the tenant farmer is taking his place; and even the tenant farmer is giving away surely, if slowly, to the farm laborer.

It were supreme folly to attempt to destroy the trust, in so far as it marks a mere tendency to concentration. As was said before, there is no necessary harm in concentration. The evil grows out of concentration plus monopoly. And it has been asserted that no monopoly can long exist without some special grant of privilege. There are patent monopolies, but these can exist only for a limited period, and can therefore play no very serious part in the great economic drama. The tariff will enable its beneficiaries to rob the people up to the point where internal competition is invited, and this in turn invites combination. But suppose that every concern in the whole country engaged in the production of a certain commodity were to enter into a combination which would throttle competition and enable the producers of this commodity to sell up to the full tariff limit, what would hinder others from setting up in the same business? The combination would speedily break of its own weight unless it were the possessor of some valuable natural monopoly.

WHY RESTRICTION FAILS.

We have been dealing and we are proposing still further to deal with trusts by restrictive measures. These measures in the past have been abortive. Is there any reason to believe that new measures of restriction will afford better results? The proposition to license trusts is too grotesque to be seriously considered, but if we were to license trusts, as we do saloons, the trusts would go into politics then for sure, just as the saloons have done. The Sherman antitrust law has been as unavailing as it was probably intended to be by the able statesmen who sought to fool and did fool the people with it. And if a thousand other laws of restrictive character were piled upon the statute books the result would not be different. The trusts would continue business just the same.

This is no partisan question. It concerns every American. We can afford to divide on questions of policy, but we can not afford to divide on a question which involves the very essence of republicanism. Lincoln loved the plain people and often referred to them. He never ceased to trust them, and they never betrayed his trust. He said you could fool all of the people some of the time and some of the people all of the time, but you could not fool all the people all of the time. Apparently this wise yet homely saying is discredited by some of the leadership of to-day. It seems to be the governing thought that you can fool all the people all the time. But surely no one can be fooled by the pretense that our own rights are not in danger when the rights of others are abridged and denied. Nor can anyone of ordinary perception be fooled by the assumption that if the Government shall take care of the rich the rich will take care of the poor. Yet this assumption has been gravely made, and it has been too freely accepted, as the enormous monopolies which menace the land but too powerfully testify.

WHAT LINCOLN SAID.

Lincoln 50 years ago observed and denounced "the effort to place capital on an equal footing with labor in the structure of government." "It is assumed," he said, "that labor is available only in connection with capital, that nobody labors unless somebody else, owning capital, somehow by the use of it, induces him to labor." With an insight keener than that of any other statesman of his time, he saw the grotesque error of this assumption. He declared that there was no such relation between capital and labor. "Labor is prior to and independent of capital," he said in his first annual message to Congress. "Capital is only the fruit of labor and could never exist if labor had not first existed; labor is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration." But he did not deny that capital had its rights, nor did he deny that there was and probably always would be a relation between capital and labor producing mutual benefits. He saw ahead of his time. He foresaw the growth of what some are pleased to call capitalism, but what he knew and we know as monopoly, but he did not make the sad mistake of imagining a war between capital and labor. He knew that these two partners in producing wealth could not quarrel—for how can a workman quarrel with his tools; how can the tools quarrel with the workman who uses them? But he understood that the man who could own another man could own and did own that other man's labor. And he saw that this was the fundamental economic fact—the real cause of that irrepressible conflict whose expression was found in rebellion and the open or covert attacks upon the people's right to govern themselves. He declared that no man was good enough to govern himself and another man. Freedom was his watchword, and he turns aside in a grave state paper, dealing with the perplexities of war and the mighty problems which rebellion thrust upon him, to felicitate the country on the fact that there was not of necessity any such thing as the free hired laborers being fixed to that condition of life.

Many independent men everywhere—a few years back in their lives were hired laborers. The prudent, penniless beginner in the world labors for wages a while, saves a surplus with which to buy tools or land for himself, then labors on his own account another while, and at length hires another new beginner to help him. This is the just and generous and prosperous system which opens the way to all, gives hope to all, and consequent energy and progress and improvement of condition to all. No men living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty; none less inclined to take or touch ought which they have not honestly earned. Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them until all of liberty shall be lost.

These words were written over 50 years ago. What has become of that just and generous and prosperous system which then opened the way to all, gave hope to all, and consequent energy and progress and improvement of condition to all? Can it now be truly said that labor is not fixed to that condition of life? Lincoln said that labor was not so fixed in his day. Can you say as much in 1914? The prudent, penniless beginner of his time labored for wages a while, then he began working for himself, and then he became an employer. Has the beginner in my State of Pennsylvania any such spur to energy? Largely speaking, is there any hope for him ever to cease working for wages? Can he ever seriously aspire to rise much higher than to a petty foremanship? Is there one chance in a hundred thousand that he may become himself an employer?

THE GIANTS OF PRIVILEGE.

What has wrought this change? Chattel slavery has gone; invention has enormously increased the efficiency of human labor. It ought therefore to be easier for labor to win its way from penniless beginnings through the intermediate steps to a competency. But is it so? Does not the struggle grow harder and harder and the prospect less and less hopeful? And if the burden of industrial conditions even in that comparatively hopeful time rested upon the great soul of Lincoln, urging him to warn his countrymen against placing capital above labor, how much more it must devolve upon us to wave the danger signals. For capital has indeed been placed before labor. Legislation under 50 years of Republican rule has looked after the dollar and left the man to look after himself. Giants have been built up on privilege, and to-day we are facing those possibilities which Lincoln dreaded, when powers that the people have surrendered are being used to close the door of advancement and to fix new burdens and disabilities upon them. It is now but a matter of keeping on in the way we have been going until all liberty shall be lost, as he feared we should lose it.

Let us consider for a moment what privilege really means. There is nothing in itself in wearing a crown. Anyone could plait himself a crown of straw or of thorns if he pleased, and he might wear it without offense. He might even build a triple one of gold and have it set full of diamonds and precious stones, yet would it be but a bauble, a toy, the vanity of a fool, were that all. It is when there is something behind the crown, some power, some authority, some privilege, which it typifies. Thus a king with a hundred crowns and without a kingdom were as deviceless and as puny a monarch as that one who in a padded cell plaits his crown of straw and wields a broken reed for a scepter over the fantastic hosts trooping through his disordered mind. But let there be power, let privilege be vested, let authority be grasped and its exercise conceded, then, whether the man so clothed shall wear a crown and wield a scepter or not, whether he shall call himself a king or merely a "captain of industry," the effect upon those who must come when he says come, must go when he says go, must render tribute when he demands it, must bow to his authority and acknowledge his privilege when he asserts them, is the same. And while we have no crowns in America and no titles of nobility, we still have a privileged class whose power over the lives and destinies of the rest is as absolute and as imperious as ever that imposed by czar or prince. Your Andrew Carnegie is a "triumphant Democrat," yet no monarch who ever bestrode a throne held sway more dominantly or wielded his imperial functions with a harder hand. For the essence of kingship is the taxing power. The Stuarts realized that in their bitter fight with the Parliament; and monarchy became a figurehead when that power was resumed by the people.

THE ROOT OF THE MATTER.

Then, surely here is the root of this matter. If we have principalities and powers in this free Government; if there be barons and dukes and princes; if there be underlords and overlords; if there be those that take who have the power and those that keep who can, what is the plain solution of the problem? Is it not to unhorse privilege by destroying its taxing powers? Let the kings and potentates continue if they please to wear their crowns; let them flaunt their robes of state and their insignia of royalty if that shall tickle their vanity; but let the people whom they have been taxing refuse to vote further supplies. Let the people keep what belongs to them, and let the kings and princes keep what is theirs. But what is it that belongs to the people? Is it not the product of their labor and all the product?

If the kings and the princes have produced anything, then surely that is theirs. The people will not claim it. The people claim only what their labor has produced. And when our American royalty presents its demands for tribute, let the answer be refusal And let this refusal be made effective, not by idle protests and by vain restrictive concessions, for every restriction is but a concession, but by the repeal of all laws which vest the taxing power in private hands. There is no other way. The trust which has no taxing power is a good trust. Every one which possesses the taxing power is a bad one. And this is the distinguishing mark. Look into the nature of the trust. If it has the power of levying a tax, then it is bad and irredeemably bad. If it is not endowed by law with this special privilege or some form of it, then it is harmless if not beneficent.

THE WAR AGAINST ALL PRIVILEGE.

The war, then, is not against the trust per se; it is against privilege in general. The trust of which we complain is but an incident of privilege. Destroy the latter and the former falls as a limb falls when the tree is cut down. And since we have seen that the root of privilege is in the monopoly of natural opportunities, the first and the continuing assault should be directed to its extirpation. Attack the outposts and cut off the allies; reduce the outworks and destroy the guerrillas; yes; but press on toward the citadel. Until that has fallen, the robbers which have levied tribute upon labor, that have demanded service without returning it, that have compelled the people to make bricks without straw, will still be in command; they will still lay upon labor tasks and burdens; and its fighting and its sacrifices will have been in vain.

Repeal all tariffs.

Take over all natural monopolies.

Untax labor and the products of labor, and for all other taxes substitute a single tax on the value of land, irrespective of improvements.

And thus, and thus only, shall we destroy privilege and all its brood. [Applause.]

The committee rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15657, and finding itself without a quorum, the roll was called under the rule, and 269 Members had answered to their names, and he reported a list of the absentees.

A quorum being present, the committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], a member of the committee, so much time as he cares to consume.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss some of the more important provisions of this trust legislation. In doing so I desire to go more into detail than has been done by those who have preced d me c ncerning certain provisions of the bill and the reasons therefor.

Before going into a discussion of the merits of the different propositions embodied in this proposed legislation I want to call attention briefly to some of the criticisms made against the bill. My colleague on the committee, Mr. VOLSTEAD, the senior member of the Judiciary Committee on the minority side, who filed a minority report, intimated last night in his speech, if he did not say it, that this bill had in some way been framed in secret. I desire to say that no bill that was ever brought into this House has been more openly considered, both by the committee and by the country at large and by everyone who desired to consider it, than has this bill. It is true that the Judiciary Committee assigned the work of framing the bill to a subcommittee composed of the chairman [Mr. CLAYTON], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], and myself. We worked for hours, for days, and for weeks formulating the provisions of this measure when no one esle was present, but whenever we formulated a proposition we brought it into the spotlight, laid it not only before the members of the committee but before the country. This legislation was in response to the message of the President delivered January 20, 1914.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman give us the names again of the subcommittee?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Chairman CLAYTON, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], and myself.

Mr. MANN. There was no minority member on that subcommittee?

Mr FLOYD of Arkansas. No; there was not. When the tentative bills were first prepared they were printed and notice was issued through the press to the country, inviting criticism, and people interested in the legislation came from all parts of the country and all sections of the country and criticized various provisions in the bills and suggested amendments. We had public hearings for weeks. I want to say that many of these criticisms proved valuable to the committee; many suggestions made were finally incorporated in the bill as it was finally submitted to the House.

But there is another class of critics to whom I want to pay my respects—the men that criticize the provisions of the bill who do not know what it contains. We get them from all sources and from all over the country. I have here a criticism of this kind; it came from my own State. It is from the Blytheville Courier, a newspaper published at Blytheville, Ark. It is a marked copy. It reads as follows:

A VICIOUS LAW.

Congressman CLAYTON has introduced in Congress an antitrust amendment to the law now operating which is vicious and should be defeated. It provides exemption for every known kind of organization not organized for profit except the retail associations. Under this law all corporations such as the retail corporations in Blytheville would be put out of business.

The measure was introduced April 14, and is brand-new. All retail associations or corporations should get busy with their Congressmen and Senators and have the bill killed. It is a case of act quickly, as the law is cleverly framed, and unless close attention is paid it might become a law.

And yet, as I will show you later, the provisions relating to the subjects he is discussing are, in the judgment of the committee, in favor of the smaller business men of the country, and are attempts to check the growth, power, and rapacity and the unfair methods of the great trusts and combinations.

Now, the editor of the Blytheville Courier is the editor of a small newspaper in Arkansas. I want now to read an editorial from another source, from the New York World of May 20, 1914:

[Editorial from the New York World of May 20, 1914.]

INOPPORTUNE.

The administration trust bills are not going to have any bed of roses to repose on during their consideration by Congress. Unscrupulous big business, against which they are aimed, is openly hostile to them. Scrupulous business, big and small, in whose behalf they are projected, is certainly not clamoring for them. And now labor is getting a large and heavy club ready for them.

Attacked by the special interests of capital and labor which they are deemed to antagonize, suspected by the honest business which they seek to befriend, there is left to these bills nothing but to petition the support of the general public which represents no special interest, good or bad, but solely the general welfare. And this general public has so far ignored them.

Why? Because, however inherently just these bills may be, they have committed the offense of being inopportune.

Those are the comments of the New York World, and it seems to me that the writer misconceives the purposes of the bill and misconceives the temper of the American people just as completely in other directions as did the editor of the Blytheville Courier. As a member of the Judiciary Committee of this House, I desire to take up and explain the provisions of this bill. No special interest is behind them but the general public, and the World seems to be impressed with the idea and to be of the opinion that there is nobody here to represent the general public. That is the function of the American Congress, and fortunate indeed will it be for the American people when the American Congress, in acting upon all measures of legislation, will stand not for any special interest but for the interest of the general public. [Applause.] I have an abiding confidence that this Congress, in the consideration of this great measure, will so act.

Mr. AVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; for a question.

Mr. AVIS. In preparing section 3——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline to yield for that question now. I am making some preliminary remarks on the bill, but when I enter into a discussion of the several sections I will take pleasure in yielding to the gentleman.

While the Democratic Party in its platform for years has declared in favor of trust legislation, and other party platforms have declared in favor of trust legislation, while the Democratic President delivered to the Congress on January 20 last that able and patriotic message which sent a ring of joy into the hearts of the small business men all over this country, we bring this measure here, not as a party measure, not as a measure that the Democratic Party alone stands behind. It is not the result of any caucus action, and the questions involved in it, I will say frankly, are not party questions in a strict sense. This trust question is entirely different from the tariff question. There is a straight alignment between Democrats and Republicans, and there has been for years on the tariff question, but this trust evil is an evil recognized in Republican States as well as in Democratic States, and I think I will be able to show you that in so far as State legislatures are concerned, many Republican States have been more active in trying to curb these evils than some of our Democratic States. I make this statement in order that you may understand the attitude of this committee, the attitude of the President, and the attitude of the Democratic Party now in power. This bill is brought in under a rule, it is true, which limits general debate, but which is wide open when it comes to amendment and the time for debating those amendments; and in bringing this bill before you and before the House the members of the Judiciary Committee, who are intrusted with the grave responsibility of framing the legislation, must defend every line and every paragraph of it before the criticism and judgment of the Members of this House.

Mr. Chairman, this is a great question. The World says in its editorial that it is brought in at an inopportune time; but, so far as the Democratic Party is concerned, it has not written a platform since 1896 wherein it has not pledged to the American people if intrusted with power in national affairs to reform the evil of trusts; and now for the first time in power it ill becomes anyone to say that because the present Executive and the majority of the party in power have already finished two great tasks, the passage of the tariff law and the passage of the currency law, that their efforts are inopportune when they are endeavoring in good faith to live up to their pledges and promises to the American people and enact trust legislation. The criticism is unjust, even though to enact that legislation may be somewhat of a hardship on the individual Members of this Congress; but we are here to represent the public interests, and the public interests of this country demand legislation to further check and curb gigantic monopoly, corrupt monopoly—to use the language of the World, unscrupulous big business—in this country.

The first section of the bill deals simply with definitions, technical definitions for the purpose of convenient reference in the bill, and I do not care to take any further time about that provision.

I now desire to take up and discuss somewhat in detail section 2, one of the vital sections of the bill. It strikes at a great evil, strikes at a practice that has been exercised by great and powerful corporations in this country to drive out and destroy competitors. I refer to price discrimination. The States commenced years ago to deal with that important feature of this legislation, and I hold in my hand a compilation of the anti-trust laws of the various States that have passed laws, similar and identical in substance, somewhat varying in phraseology, to prevent the very wrong and injustice and unfair discrimination within the States which we now seek to protect the American people from in interstate commerce in section 2 of this bill.

I want to read you the list of the names of the States that have passed those laws, but of course I will not take the time to read any of these State laws. I want to get in the RECORD the names of the States that have adopted laws to prevent unfair discrimination, based upon the same principle that is embodied in this provision of the bill. They are Arkansas, California, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Wisconsin, Wyoming—21 in number. We have been told by the critics of this provision of the bill that there is no necessity for it, that the States have adopted such laws, and that that is sufficient; but we have had before our committee testimony showing that both Wisconsin and Michigan have that kind of a statute on their books now, and that one of these great corporations engaged in selling its products in interstate commerce lowered the price of gasoline 1 cent lower in Michigan than in Wisconsin, in order to drive out all competitors from the State of Michigan. Should not the American Congress protect the States and the people of the States from any such unfair method of business?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to interrupt the gentleman and will not indulge in it, but in preparing this list of States and in asserting that they have similar statutes the gentleman does not mean to infer that these statutes are like this provision in the bill, does he? For instance, in Wisconsin they are related to competition and restraint of trade, but the gentleman's provision has gone entirely out of that field. Is not that true?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I said for a similar purpose.

Mr. NELSON. But not identical in language?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Oh, no. I did not say that they were identical in language. The State statutes are more drastic than this provision. It is easier to convict a man under the State statutes than it will be under this bill if it becomes a law. We have thrown around this law certain technical requirements that are not present in most of the State statutes, in respect to conviction, and that is the criticism that our friend and our colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], who has just interrupted me, makes of the bill—it is not drastic enough. The point I make is that we undertake in this provision to assert a principle and provide a law to prevent the unfair discrimination in sales in interstate commerce, and that that principle has been adopted in 21 States of the Union, and adopted because of the practice and unfair methods of these great and powerful corporations which are driving out competitors and destroying independent companies all over the country to such an extent that the people of those States in their sovereignity as States have asserted their authority, as far as it is within their power to assert it, and those are the people who represent no special interests, but who are represented by you and the membership of this House, and who are demanding legislation on the part of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. This section provides, as the gentleman knows, that this discrimination in price, in order to be unlawful, must be done with the intent or purpose to destroy or wrongfully injure a competitior. Is it not a fact that of all of these State statutes in the Union there is only one, the State of Louisiana, where that phrase is used, that in all of the other States this discrimination in price to be unlawful must be made to establish a monopoly, or to substantially lessen competition, or something of that kind, while there is only one——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; I do not admit that, and I hope the gentleman will argue that proposition in his own time. I can not admit that. I am insisting upon this, not that this is a literal copy of the statutes of the States, or any of them, but that great abuses have grown up in this country by great and powerful corporations underselling in local communities in order to destroy competitors, to drive out competition, and to acquire monopolies; and if the gentleman will read the decisions of the courts in the great cases that have been already decided, like the American Tobacco Co. case and notably the Standard Oil case, he will find that this practice of discrimination is one of their favorite methods of suppressing competition and of building up these huge monopolies. The Standard Oil Co., incorporated in New Jersey, was given the right in its charter to operate not only in this country but throughout the world.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. It is the same question I asked the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yesterday and I would like to have the gentleman from Arkansas answer it. I make it without any desire to criticize, but simply for the purpose of obtaining information.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. What is the question?

Mr. COOPER. In section 2, in the proviso beginning in line 7, page 21, there is an express authorization of discrimination, as I understand it——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not so understand it.

Mr. COOPER. I will ask the gentleman to read it with me, beginning with line 7 of the proviso——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not have to read it.

Mr. COOPER. Let me finish, please, my question, as it will take but a moment. This proviso says:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality—

Now, here is the important thing—or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation.

Now, my question is this: Two dealers in a town buy from the same wholesaler. One retailer is a large concern, and the other is a poor man with a small store. The large concern buys several carloads of a product. It gets the product for less than its small competitor, who buys only a half carload, and the large retailer pays less rates for transportation on the railroad than his small competitor pays who buys in less-than-carload lots. So the large retail concern, buying of the wholesaler and getting not only goods but transportation also at a less price than its smaller competitor, is permitted under this proviso an opportunity to practice unrestricted cutthroat competition and ruin the smaller dealer.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Now, I desire to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin frankly and fairly. That proviso authorizes nothing. Any man under the laws that exist to-day can do any of those things. It is a common business practice, practiced everywhere, and it has been practiced everywhere for ages. We simply leave the law as it is in that respect.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will permit another interruption, I remind him that this proviso does not prohibit discrimination. It expressly authorizes it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to answer the gentleman's first question before I get to a second one. We leave the law as it is as to the things mentioned in the proviso. We are drafting a criminal statute, which some gentlemen who have discussed its provisions heretofore in this debate and many outside of this Chamber have regarded as exceedingly drastic. We make it a high crime under the law to discriminate in price by methods and evil practices described, but we have not attempted in this provision or anywhere in this bill to make it a crime for a man to carry on any legitimate and customary practice that the business world has recognized and followed for centuries, other than those methods and practices herein specifically condemned. The things mentioned in the provisos are authorized by existing law, and we do not forbid them. We did not intend to forbid them, and we do not believe they ought to be forbidden. The statutes of most States to which I have alluded make the same exceptions, and, if I am not badly mistaken, they occur in the statutes of the State of Wisconsin, from which the gentleman comes.

Mr. NELSON. Not as to the quantity, but on a different basis entirely.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not desire to devote too much time to this particular section, as there are many sections in the bill.

Mr. COOPER. The question I asked goes to the vitals of this whole question. We can not in this connection discuss anything more important.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. What is the question? I agree to that.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman says they did not intend to prohibit anything that the business world has authorized——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; I did not say that; the gentleman misunderstood me. We did not intend to prohibit business methods which are mentioned in that exception, but we do prohibit other practices further on in this bill which we consider evils that the business world has recognized and practiced extensively, but, we believe, to the detriment of every small dealer in this country and to the detriment of the entire country.

Mr. COOPER. Then, will the gentleman answer this question? Does not this proviso expressly permit——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We leave the law as it is.

Mr. COOPER. But expressly permit a discrimination as between purchasers in large quantities who get their goods at a less price and transportation at a less price—a discrimination which will enable them in their discretion to crowd out the smaller man, as they do now.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not want the gentleman to put words in my mouth. It does no such thing. The provision is in plain language and seeks to prevent dealers from lowering the price of commodities in different sections and communities by unfair discrimination with the intent and purpose to destroy, ruin, or injure the business of a competitor. That is a recognized evil extensively practiced by great and powerful concerns to drive out competition and destroy competitors, which results to the serious detriment of the general public, and has been demonstrated to be a most effective means in acquiring a monopoly.

It does that and nothing more, and is not intended to do anything more. If there are other evil methods and practices that ought to be condemned and corrected, we leave it to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and his colleague on the committee [Mr. NELSON], who has filed a minority report, to bring forward appropriate amendments here and debate them before this House, and we have left the bill open to amendment under the rule, so that anyone can tack on any amendment to it that can secure the necessary votes to sustain such amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Just for a moment. I have already taken too much time on this section.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In regard to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], he intimated or stated in the question that this dealt with the question of transportation in such a way as to make transportation cheaper when large quantities were transported than when smaller quantities were transported. Is there any such provision as that?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. He is in error about that. If the quantity of goods should be larger, and if the railroad company should make a reduction there might be some remission of cost of freight there. But that is a matter concerning which we leave the law as it is. We have not undertaken to disturb that condition. We have left that to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and have not undertaken to deal with the particular question.

Now, gentlemen, we have been confronted with many questions, and——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. May I ask just a question before the gentleman leaves that?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Now, as I understand you, if it can be proven that there is intent to destroy or injure a competitor, the person charged with the offense could not fall back on this proviso and say that he was saved because he was permitted to make a different price for different amounts of goods?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That would be a question for the jury. If you could prove the intent, and that he was discriminating for this specific purpose, he would be guilty.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Although the proviso says——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If he were doing it merely in conformity with the purposes of the proviso, and not for the purpose of wrongfully injuring or destroying a competitor, he could not be guilty.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. There would be no presumption of the mere intent in the fact that he has shipped to one person at cheaper rates than to another? That leaves it wide open for discrimination.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We require the Government, in order to sustain conviction, to prove a specific case of wrongful intent and wrongful purpose. If by any circumstance the accused party can show that the lowering of the price was not unlawful discrimination, was not done for the specific purpose and with the wrongful intent of destroying or injuring a competitor, he would not be guilty under the provision of this section.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS. In drafting this bill, have not you merely recognized the fact that it costs less money for articles when sold in large quantities than when sold in small quantities, and in that sense it costs the man who is making the sale more money to sell in small quantities, and that he may receive a larger profit in the aggregate than by selling it in small quantities? Is not that the same principle recognized in fixing railroad rates? For instance, a man in shipping a carload of nails, the man who gets a carload gets a cheaper rate than the man who gets only one keg?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I am attempting to make an outline of this bill under general debate. We will have unlimited debate under the five-minute rule, and I would consider it a courtesy if I might be permitted to proceed to give my views of several of the important provisions of this bill; and at the end of the time I will be glad to answer any questions, if I have any time left. If not, we will have the freest debate under the five-minute rule, and I can do so then. I do not mean by that to ask Members not to ask any questions, but I hope when it comes to discussing controverted matters and controverted points that you will leave those matters for consideration to a later period in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FESS. As many of us are students trying to get at the truth of the matter, we would like to ask the questions from the man who has made a study of it, purely for information.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I shall be glad to answer such questions if I can.

Mr. FESS. I am beclouded yet on this point. I recognize it is an economic principle to allow a smaller price for large quantities. That is recognized the world over. But the question with me is whether you are curing the thing you want to cure by putting it on the basis of proving intent.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We are curing what is a recognized evil. You will bear in mind this is supplementary legislation to the Sherman antitrust law. You will bear in mind it is made an offense punishable by fine of not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding a year, or both. And your committee, following out the suggestions of the President in his message, intended not to disturb that which was not evil, not to disturb business any more than was necessary, in order to correct certain great evils and notorious practices that exist in this country to the detriment of the general public.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield on that score?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. The Sherman antitrust law would not prevent discriminations in communities within the State, would it?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. This provision, if enacted into law, will prevent discriminations in sales in interstate commerce.

Mr. BATHRICK. But not in communities wholly within the State?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; not to discriminations wholly within the State.

Mr. BATHRICK. It will not?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at all.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I simply wish to ask the gentleman one question, and I will not interrupt him again. After all, does not this section perpetuate in law the scriptural proposition that—

For he that hath, to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath.

It is just the same proposition we have been operating under for several years?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at all.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to have the gentleman dwell on that.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will answer that question most emphatically in the negative. This is to carry into transactions in interstate commerce prohibition of certain practices that have caused the utter ruin and destruction of hundreds and thousands of prosperous small business men by great and powerful corporations through unfair practices. The States have been more active than the Federal Government, but the fact is that in these 21 States that have adopted these laws most of them were enacted in 1911, 1912, and 1913. You have heard of a division in the great Republican Party between the insurgents—now called Progressives—and the Republicans, have you not? Let me tell you the origin of it. It is due to a difference in regard to this character of legislation. The Progressive Republican stands for regulation and curbing of these trusts, and our old friends, the "standpatters," stood pat until all the popularity they ever had slipped away, and until in the last election they carried only two States. Their failure to enact legislation to curb and destroy monopolies and trusts was largely responsible for the division in their ranks which resulted in their defeat.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I would ask the gentleman to let me go on. There are 23 sections in this bill, and I can not devote all my time to one section. However, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will be very brief. Do I understand you to say that a corporation, for instance, in Illinois, engaged in selling goods all over the United States, would be subject to the provisions of this law for any violation of it, except in the State of Illinois?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No.

Mr. McKENZIE. I thought so.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Everywhere in the State of Illinois, if it is engaged in interstate commerce; but if it is not engaged in interstate commerce, then it would not be under the inhibitions of this statute.

Now, that brings me to the question of power, and I especially desire to consider this question in connection with the next section of the bill. I want to read from the Northern Securities case, 193 United States Reports, page 335:

By the express words of the Constitution Congress has power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." In view of the numerous decisions of this court there ought not at this day to be any doubt as to the general scope of such power. In some circumstances regulation may properly take the form and have the effect of prohibition. In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545; Lottery case, 188 U. S., 321, 355, and authorities there cited. Again and again this court has reaffirmed the doctrine announced in the great judgment rendered by Chief Justice Marshall for the court in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1, 196, 197) that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations is the power "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed"; that such power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution"; that "if, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to these objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States"; that a sound construction of the Constitution allows to Congress a large discretion, "with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people"; and that if the end to be accomplished is within the scope of the Constitution "all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited are constitutional."

Again, in the case of the Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U. S., 237 and 238), the court says:

Those who were stockholders of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific and became stockholders in the holding company are now interested in preventing all competition between the two lines, and as owners of stock or of certificates of stock in the holding company they will see to it that no competition is tolerated. They will take care that no persons are chosen directors of the holding company who will permit competitions between the constituent companies. The result of the combination is that all the earnings of the constituent companies make a common fund in the hands of the Northern Securities Co. to be distributed, not upon the basis of the earnings of the respective constituent companies, each acting exclusively in its own interest, but upon the basis of the certificates of stock issued to the holding company. No scheme or device could more certainly come within the words of the act—"combination in the form of a trust or otherwise * * * in restraint of commerce among the several States or with foreign nations"—or could more effectively and certainly suppress free competition between the constituent companies. This combination is, within the meaning of the act, a "trust," but if not, it is a combination in restraint of interstate and international commerce, and that is enough to bring it under the condemnation of the act. The mere existence of such a combination and the power acquired by the holding company as its trustee constitute a menace to and a restraint upon that freedom of commerce which Congress intended to recognize and protect and which the public is entitled to have protected. If such combination be not destroyed, all the advantages that would naturally come to the public under the operation of the general laws of competition, as between the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railways Cos., will be lost and the entire commerce of the immense territory in the northern part of the United States between the Great Lakes and the Pacific at Puget Sound will be at the mercy of a single holding corporation, organized in a State distant from the people of that territory.

The court in the case of Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States (175 U. S., pp. 228, 229) says:

In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1) the power was declared to be complete in itself and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution.

Under this grant of power to Congress that body, in our judgment, may enact such legislation as shall declare void and prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect of such a contract will be, when carried out, to directly, and not as a mere incident to other and innocent purposes, regulate to any substantial extent interstate commerce—and when we speak of interstate, we also include in our meaning foreign commerce. We do not assent to the correctness of the proposition that the constitutional guaranty of liberty to the individual to enter into private contracts limits the power of Congress and prevents it from legislating upon the subject of contracts of the class mentioned.

The power to regulate interstate commerce is, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts of the nature in question from the jurisdiction of that body. Nor is any such limitation contained in that other clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It has been held that the word "liberty," as used in the Constitution, was not to be confined to the mere liberty of person, but included, among others, a right to enter into certain classes of contracts for the purpose of enabling the citizen to carry on his business. Allgeyer v. Louisiana (165 U. S., 578); United States v. Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S., 505, 572). But it has never been, and in our opinion ought not to be, held that the word included the right of an individual to enter into private contracts upon all subjects, no matter what their nature and wholly irrespective, among other things, of the fact that they would, if performed, result in the regulation of interstate commerce and in the violation of an act of Congress upon that subject. The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional right to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is, to some extent, limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into these private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

We can not so enlarge the scope of the language of the Constitution regarding the liberty of the citizen as to hold that it includes or that it was intended to include a right to make a contract which, in fact, restrained and regulated interstate commerce, notwithstanding Congress, proceeding under the constitutional provision giving to it the power to regulate.

Again, in same case, pages 230, 231, the court says:

In the Debs case (158 U. S., 564) it was said by Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court: "It is curious to note the fact that in a large proportion of the cases in respect to interstate commerce brought to this court the question presented was of the validity of State legislation in its bearing upon interstate commerce, and the uniform course of decision has been to declare that it is not within the competency of a State to legislate in such a manner as to obstruct interstate commerce. If a State, with its recognized power of sovereignty, is impotent to obstruct interstate commerce, can it be that any mere voluntary association of individuals within the limits of that State has a power which the State itself does not possess?"

What sound reason can be given why Congress should have the power to interfere in the case of the State, and yet have none in the case of the individual? Commerce is the important subject of consideration, and anything which directly obstructs and thus regulates that commerce which is carried on among the States, whether it is State legislation or private contracts between individuals or corporations, should be subject to the power of Congress in the regulation of that commerce.

The power of Congress over this subject seems to us much more important and necessary than the liberty of the citizen to enter into contracts of the nature above mentioned, free from the control of Congress, because the direct results of such contracts might be the regulation of commerce among the States, possibly quite as effectually as if a State had passed a statute of like tenor as the contract.

The liberty of contract in such case would be nothing more than the liberty of doing that which would result in the regulation, to some extent, of a subject which from its general and great importance has been granted to Congress as the proper representative of the Nation at large. Regulation, to any substantial extent, of such a subject by any other power than that of Congress, after Congress has itself acted thereon, even though such regulation is effected by means of private contracts between individuals or corporations, is illegal, and we are unaware of any reason why it is not as objectionable when attempted by individuals as by the State itself. In both cases it is an attempt to regulate a subject which for the purpose of regulation has been with some exceptions, such as are stated in Mobile County v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 697), Morgan v. Louisiana (118 U. S., 455, 465), Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. Railway (125 U. S., 465), Western Union Telegraph Co. v. James (162 U. S., 650, 655) exclusively granted to Congress; and it is essential to the proper execution of that power that Congress should have jurisdiction as much in the one case as in the other.

It is indeed urged that to include private contracts of this description within the grant of this power to Congress is to take from the States their own power over the subject, and to interfere with the liberty of the individual in a manner and to an extent never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution and not fairly justified by any language used in that instrument. If Congress has not the power to legislate upon the subject of contracts of the kind mentioned, because the constitutional provision as to the liberty of the citizen limits, to that extent, its power to regulate interstate commerce, then it would seem to follow that the several States have that power, although such contracts relate to interstate commerce, and, more or less, regulate it. If neither Congress nor the State legislatures have such power, then we are brought to the somewhat extraordinary position that there is no authority, State or National, which can legislate upon the subject of or prohibit such contracts. This can not be the case.

The court, in same case, pages 233 to 235, further discussing the case, has this to say:

The remark in Railroad Co. v. Richmond, 19 Wall, 584, that it was never intended that the power of Congress should be exercised so as to interfere with private contracts not designed at the time they were made to create impediments to interstate commerce, when read in connection with the facts stated in the reports, is entirely sound. * * *

There is no intimation in this remark that Congress has no power to legislate regarding those contracts which do directly regulate and restrain interstate commerce. The inference is quite the reverse, and it is plain that the case assumes if private contracts when entered into do directly interfere with and regulate interstate commerce, Congress had power to condemn them. If the necessary, direct, and immediate effect of the contract be to violate an act of Congress and also to restrain and regulate interstate commerce, it is manifestly immaterial whether the design to so regulate was or was not in existence when the contract was entered into. In such case the design does not constitute the material thing. The fact of a direct and substantial regulation is the important part of the contract, and that regulation existing, it is unimportant that it was not designed.

Where the contract affects interstate commerce only incidentally and not directly, the fact that it was not designed or intended to affect such commerce is simply an additional reason for holding the contract valid and not touched by the act of Congress. Otherwise the design prompting the execution of a contract pertaining to and directly affecting, and more or less regulating, interstate commerce is of no importance. We conclude that the plain language of the grant to Congress of power to regulate commerce among the several States includes power to legislate upon the subject of those contracts in respect to interstate or foreign commerce which directly affect and regulate that commerce, and we can find no reasonable ground for asserting that the constitutional provision as to the liberty of the individual limits the extent of that power as claimed by the appellants. We therefore think the appellants have failed in their contention upon this branch of subject.

The constitutionality of State statutes preventing these unfair discriminations has been upheld by the Supreme Court. Our contention is that the power of Congress, in the domain of interstate commerce, is as absolute as the power of the State over its intrastate commerce.

Now, I desire to take up next, in connection with this proposition, section 4 before I take up section 3, because it is more nearly related to this particular subject. Section 4 is the most misunderstood section of this bill, apparently. I hear every day of someone writing from somewhere to Members of Congress complaining that section 4 prohibits exclusive selling agencies. It not only does not do so, but it does not deal with that subject. It does not touch it. A man can establish an agency under the provisions of this bill and make any kind of a contract with his agents, on any terms upon which his agents shall sell his goods, that he sees proper to make. He is not affected by the provisions of this section.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. In the gentleman's opinion, how would this section affect the small producer who is not able to maintain independent agencies as the large combinations are? I ask that question because the objection has been brought to my attention by small manufacturers.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; and it has also been brought to our attention. The object of this section is to break up the power of giant monopoly and to liberate and free every small dealer in this land and put him in a position of independence in which he can do business in competition with any other business man in this country. This exclusive or tying contract is one of the most effective instrumentalities of monopoly that was ever devised or has ever existed. It can not be justified in morals, and the whole effect of it is monopolistic. I know we have had many arguments to the contrary, many suggestions that we should leave out this provision in order to protect the small man, and we have had many men high up in business to contend for that. But, gentlemen, it is a fallacy, and I think I can demonstrate to you that it is a fallacy. This provision is to the effect that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell in interstate commerce—to sell or lease in interstate commerce—goods, wares, or merchandise on the condition or understanding that the party purchasing or leasing shall not deal in the commodities of another who is a competitor.

Now, take the first person who makes that exclusive contract. So far as the merchant is concerned that he makes it with, he handles only the commodity of the contracting party. If it is in a city of 50,000 inhabitants or 300,000 inhabitants, there is only one place in that city where you can get that commodity, and you can not get at that store any competing article because, under the terms of this contract, he has agreed not to sell any competitive article. Now, I believe in giving every man the utmost liberty of contract concerning his own property. Hence we refuse to tie the hands of the man who is simply acting as an agent. But when a manufacturer has sold his goods and has received the money, the full price therefor, what right has he in morals, what right ought he to have in law, to make it a condition of that contract that that particular merchant shall not deal in the commodities of another producer and competitor?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman is making a speech in which we are all interested. Inadvertently he allows his voice to fall to a colloquial tone.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I thank you. I will try to avoid that.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a moment?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I am much interested in your able discussion, but I have a concrete example in my home town, wherein a wholesale merchant sold only to one retail merchant and would not sell to any other merchant in that town. Does this bill deal with that feature?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Absolutely; and section 4 is intended to prohibit that very thing, if it is made a condition of the contract that he will not deal in the commodities of a competitor.

Mr. FOWLER. Excuse me. The gentleman did not catch my point. I guess I did not make myself clear. For instance, the Douglas Shoe Co. manufactures a very good shoe. It sells to one firm only in each town where its goods are sold and refuses to allow any other man to handle them. I want to know if this bill covers that question.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If he refuses on the condition that a man who purchases the shoes will not deal in the goods of a competitor, this reaches him. But if he does not put any such condition in the contract, it does not reach him.

Mr. FOWLER. Suppose other merchants in the town wanted to handle the shoes. Would the Douglas Shoe Co. be justified in refusing to supply these merchants?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. You will have to ask the Douglas Shoe Co. about that.

Mr. FOWLER. I am only referring to the Douglas Shoe Co. as an example. I am not picking it out.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. They make what is called an exclusive or tying contract. That is, a manufacturer goes to a merchant in a town and agrees with him that if he will handle his goods exclusively and enter into a contract that he will not handle the goods of any other competitor in his line of business he will sell him the goods at a lower price and will give him a rebate at the end of a certain time or take back the remnant of the goods if he fails to sell them, exacting of the purchaser full payment for the goods, and then refusing to allow him to sell in that store the commodities of any competitor.

Now, the evil of this practice to the merchant is that it ties his hands. He can not supply his customers. He has one commodity, and perhaps his customers do not like that commodity, but would like something in the same line. Take breakfast food, for instance. He may make an exclusive contract with the local merchant to handle Corn Flakes on condition that he will not handle any other breakfast food. If a customer does not like Corn Flakes, he will have to do without other breakfast food or go to some other store. The result is that the retail merchants complain that the mail-order houses are destroying them by competition, and that the big department stores are doing likewise. It is true. Why? Because big business has tied the hands of the little merchant with exclusive contracts, and he can not supply his customers. Hence he loses his customers and fails.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] propounds the reverse of the situation covered in section 4. In section 4, as I understand, the bill provides that no seller of an article shall prohibit the buyer from buying a competitive article; but there is another evil that grows up, that sometimes the large manufacturer sells to one individual and refuses to sell to any other. Now, section 3 seems to cover that condition as to mine products.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It does, but only as to mine products.

Mr. HARDY. And requires the seller of mine products to sell to anybody who wants to buy.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It does as to mine products only.

Mr. HARDY. Why not extend that provision to other products?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. When I get to discussing section 3 I will be glad to answer that. I am discussing section 4 in connection with this proposition.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why does not the gentleman answer the gentleman from Illinois, when he asks whether a man may be permitted to sell to only one person, that in section 2, at the close of it, you have expressly authorized a party to select his own customer, excepting only coal dealers?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I told the gentleman that unless he makes this exclusive contract there is nothing to prevent a manufacturer dealing exclusively with one person or one person dealing exclusively with one manufacturer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In fact, you expressly authorize it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We have not prohibited it, and it is lawful now. I will not let the gentlemen who criticize this bill put me in any such attitude as that. There are in this country a vast number of recognized business practices and customs, and when we pick out one which we deem an evil practice the gentleman can not put me nor my committee in a false attitude by saying that we are authorizing what has existed from time immemorial. We are simply not prohibiting it. We are leaving it as it is.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield there for just a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Taking these two sections together, am I correct in interpreting the two together to mean this, that the Douglas Shoe Co., for instance, could select one shoe merchant in a given city and sell the Douglas shoe exclusively to that one merchant, provided their contract did not provide that that shoe merchant could not purchase shoes from the Robinson-Brown Shoe Co. or the Hamilton Shoe Co., or any other shoe company that might desire to sell him goods?

Mr. FLYOD of Arkansas. That is correct. If the gentleman will permit me to discuss this question without further interruption I shall be gratified, as I have some other matter here which I would like to discuss before I conclude. I think I can answer all these questions and give you the whole situation much more clearly if you will let me finish my remarks and ask your questions afterwards.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Then I shall be glad to answer questions. Under the testimony introduced at the hearings it was shown that this tying or exclusive contract is one of the greatest means of monopoly, and it is a growing one. We have been told that it is forbidden by the Sherman law already, but in one of the decisions of the circuit court of appeals Judge Sanborn holds that it is not forbidden; and then we are told that you can not invade the right of contract; that it is an evil, but you can not prohibit it. But the Supreme Court of the United States has answered that question, and holds, in the Northern Securities case and also in the Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. case, already cited, that in exercising the power over interstate commerce we can forbid certain contracts, and that in doing so we are not interfering with or depriving either party to such contract of his constitutional rights as a citizen.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman please give the title of the case in which Judge Sanborn has held as the gentleman has stated?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I shall be pleased to do so. In the case of Whitwell against Continental Tobacco Co. et al. Judge Sanborn held that the restriction of their own trade by defendants to those purchasers who declined to deal in the goods of their competitors is not a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. This case is reported in volume 125, Federal Reporter, page 454.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me at this time. I decline to yield at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas declines to yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to show to the House some of the workings of this system. The shoe industry of this country is one of the greatest industries in America, and yet it is in evidence before our committee, and not controverted, that 98 or 99 per cent of all the shoe machinery used o uppers in the United States is not sold by the Shoe Machinery Company, but owned by it and leased to the shoe manufacturers in the United States on exclusive contracts, on condition that if the shoe manufacturer uses any piece of machinery of like kind, manufactured by any other concern in the United States, then, under the terms of the lease, the Shoe Machinery Company is given the right to take out of the factory every piece of their machinery, the effect of which would be to bankrupt the manufacturer and close his factory.

I am glad that last evening the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr MITCHELL], a Representative in this House from the State of Massachusetts, and a member of the Judiciary Committee, and who formerly served in the legislature of that State, spoke in support of this provision. What would be the liberty of the citizen if our business was all run upon that principle? No man would own his own shop. Go into some large shoe manufacturing establishment in St. Louis or Cincinnati. The machinery used there is leased from a trust and is not owned by the manufacturer. Although his business amounts to millions of dollars, yet the hands of the manufacturer are tied by an unsconscionable contract that if he patronizes a competitor by buying any piece of machinery used for a like purpose they will withdraw all of their leased machinery from his factory. Who can stand for such a contract as that? Congress has the power to make it unlawful. Let us do it.

Now, let us take another illustration which is most complete and interesting.

Mr. FESS. Before you leave this, may I ask a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I wonder if this law does forbid the things we are trying to reach? Is there any danger that a concern like the Douglas shoe factory will establish its distributing points all over the country and not pass title to the shoes? Is there anything in that?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; not a thing in the world, in my opinion. I have been through the shops and recognize the evil of this system. I walked through the shops in St. Louis and had the machines pointed out to me by a friend of mine, who stated that he was paying the worth of the machines as a royalty, but that he could not say a word, he could not buy a competitive article, he could not replace them with cheaper machinery because the company supplying them had some machines that were absolutely essential, and if he did they would take all the machines out under the terms of their contract and destroy his business and bankrupt him as they and other concerns who engage in this practice or system have destroyed hundreds and thousands of business men all over the country.

I call attention especially to the testimony of Mr. Rogers, an attorney who appeared before us in regard to the motion-picture business. I am not going to take your time to read you all that Mr. Rogers said, but I wish to call your attention to the testimony which begins on page 470 of the hearings. I quote, in part, as follows:

STATEMENT OF GUSTAVUS A. ROGERS, ESQ., OF NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. ROGERS. My reason for appearing before your committee is that I thought if I should recite to you some of the difficulties that my firm encountered as counsel for a concern in New York City which had been previously interfered with by the trust, so called, which is now being prosecuted under the Sherman Antitrust Act by the United States Government in an equity suit, in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, that the experience that my client had might give you a practical idea of some of the existing difficulties, and indicating strongly the necessity for adopting the provisions recommended or presented in the bills of Judge CLAYTON, supplemented, possibly, by several suggestions that I will make to you.

The suit that I refer to is the suit of the United States Government against the Motion Picture Patents Co. and other defendants, generally the defendants in the suit are known as the Motion Picture Trust.

I think that the presentation of the situation and a recital of the circumstances under which that combination was effected, and its operations, will probably be as illustrative as anything else I could say to you of what is required in the way of an antimonopoly act. I think it is as illuminating as any case that will be called to your attention throughout your deliberations. I think I say that advisedly, because in this instance you not only have the presence of a combination of firms and corporations engaged in dealing in an important commodity, but you have the question presented of a combination of competing or correlated or interrelated or dependent patents into one holding company. You have a combination of manufacturers who, at the time of the creation of this combination, manufactured possibly 95 per cent of the entire commodity, and you have an organization created by this combination, by the manufacturers, as a selling agency for the combined output of all these manufacturers, and you have present a situation which shows that this combination, within a period of a few months after its organization, drove out of business, by means to which I shall call your attention presently, every one of the customers who had dealt with the manufacturers with the exception of my client, and how he was able to stay in business I shall show you in a few moments. They not only drove these customers out of business, but turned over to this sole selling agency company all the business in that particular industry.

I do not want to burden you with this matter, except as it is important to demonstrate how quickly a combination can do something that is utterly impossible for an individual ever to accomplish in a lifetime.

Up to the spring of 1908 the industry was absolutely open and without restriction. The motion-picture films were made and manufactured and sold as unpatented articles. The dealer in the film—perhaps I ought to interpose here and speak for a moment about the film itself. The film itself which is commercially used is a celluloid film strip, consisting of a reel of approximately 1,000 feet in length. These different positives are printed from the negative taken with the camera; they are duplicate prints, in analogy representing positive photographs made from the negatives.

These reels of films were sold in the market. Anybody who wanted to purchase them would go to the manufacturer, make his bargain with him, and buy his film and do as he pleased with it. He might sell it or lease it for exhibition purposes. He could export it and do as he wanted with it. The projecting machine by which this film was projected on the screen was, prior to the spring of 1908, sold as an unpatented article, and there were thousands of them sold—several thousands, in any event.

In the spring of 1908 the Edison Co. at that time had already been defeated in the courts on a patent which was known as the Edison film patent, and under which Edison claimed that he was the inventor of motion pictures and consequently entitled under his patent to dominate the entire art. He had been defeated in that claim by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Southern District of New York, and there was no mistake about the decision of that court. It declared his claim absolutely invalid in that respect.

I was reciting the conditions as they existed in December, 1908, when the combination was first formed. These men were given the alternative of either taking the license agreement as it was drawn or going out of business entirely, because they could not get a supply of films anywhere else.

After some protest and considerable reluctance they finally concluded that they had no alternative except to sign the agreements, and the agreements were signed.

But, instead of permitting the business to be done by the entire 150 companies, that number was arbitrarily reduced to 100.

Mr. NELSON. There were 100 rental companies?

Mr. ROGERS. One hundred rental companies. Having gotten the field in that shape, the manufacturers then, within a very short time thereafter, about a year later, organized their own company, known as the General Film Co., and the avowed purpose of that company was to go into the rental business, and it was incorporated as a paper corporation, and the first thing that company did was to begin a campaign, immediately after its creation, to drive out of business every one of these hundred companies then in existence, and they succeeded, because in November, 1911, every one of these rental companies had been driven out of business with the exception of my client, and my client to-day is the only one—my client is known as the Greater New York Film Record Co.—it is the only company in the United States, and when you say the United States you mean practically in the entire world, as I shall demonstrate—that gets the output of any of these 10 manufacturers, excepting their own selling company, the General Film Co.

From this brief and short extract from the testimony it will be observed that at the beginning of this trouble a few years ago there were 10 or 12 manufacturers engaged in making motion-picture films. There were 150 concerns selling throughout the United States. The films were not patented; they were merely a transformation and improvement on the old magic lantern of our boyhood days. Mr. Edison invented some kind of a device in regard to the films that enabled him to secure a patent at the United States Patent Office. That patent was held invalid. They got all the manufacturers together and formed a license company, known as the Licensed Manufacturers. All the manufacturers consolidated, and then they notified the 150 concerns that were purchasing and distributing the films throughout the country to gather together at a meeting. At this meeting they were notified that they must purchase all their supplies thereafter from this film company; that they must reduce the number of exchanges to 100. They protested, but the manufacturers were all in the combine. They had to agree to the arrangement because it was the only source of the films, so they had to yield, and 50 out of the 150 voluntarily went out of business. They ran for about one year under that arrangement. This new film company furnished or leased the entire films used by the 100 companies. Then they made a remarkable contract. They furnished the films on a contract of lease that required them to be returned at the end of seven months, but provided that in lieu of the return of the film they had issued to them under the lease they might return any old film on hand. Of course, if a dealer turned in an old film which he owned, he lost that, and after a time he was required to turn in the film that he had leased. At the end of the year the 100 distributors had nothing in their control except the leased films, having voluntarily surrendered the old films which they owned. When the film company got them in that condition they formed what they called the General Film Co., an exclusive leasing company, one consolidated company that distributed all the films manufactured by the Motion Picture Patents Co.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. For a question.

Mr. NELSON. Under this law could not they have refused any but this one customer?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; I think not. I do not like to be interrupted in the midst of my narrative.

Mr. NELSON. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman if they had not the right to select their customers.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is not pertinent to what I am discussing. Now, at the end of the year they notified those that they were friendly with that they had better sell out, and they notified the others that on and after a certain date no more films would be furnished them under the terms of their contract. Thus arbitrarily they put out of business every concern save and except one, the one represented by Mr. Rogers.
